From Our Pastor

God with us.

It still catches me off guard when I open the Bible and run into books that feel distant or, frankly, dull. Numbers is a classic example for me. There are pages filled with numbers, and I sometimes find myself wondering, respectfully, how they still speak to us today. For a long time, the Book of Lamentations sat in the same category. It follows Jeremiah and bears witness to the destruction of Jerusalem in 586 BCE, but at first glance it feels heavy, bleak, and hard to enter.

Yet Lamentations is made up of five poems, four of them carefully shaped as acrostics, each verse following the Hebrew alphabet in order. That detail matters more than I first realized. It tells me that grief is not just chaotic screaming into the void. It can be disciplined. It can be ordered. Even despair can be spoken with intention. Pain is given a form, and a broken heart is offered a way, however fragile, to begin putting itself back together. It is cha-ordic now; order in the Chaos.

What arrested my attention this time, especially in light of our world today, was the figure of “Daughter Zion.” The city of God is imagined as a woman who has lost everything. Her children, her home, her dignity, even the life she once fought to protect in the face of violence. Her suffering is not abstract. It is personal, embodied, and public.

I find myself grieving deeply whenever fellow human beings die before their time feels complete. Who am I to know, or worse, to decide, when someone’s life should end? I am dust, after all, and to dust I will return, back to the embrace of the earth that formed me.

I return to Lamentations today not to romanticize pain, suffering or injustice. That will never be the point. I return to it as a prayer. A prayer that sounds less like answers and more like truth spoken slowly, carefully, one letter at a time, for a broken world that still longs to be heard. Hope remains. Love still speaks. God is with us.
