From Our Pastor

After Christmas: Canal, Reservoir, or Swamp?

Here we are again, after Christmas. We've been here before. The pace slows. We pause. Maybe we are catching our breath. Maybe we are beginning to turn our attention toward the New Year. This quieter stretch of days seems to invite reflection.

Yet the story of the Holy Family after Christmas tells a different truth. It is not a story of rest, but of movement—perhaps even displacement. Mary, Joseph, and the child Jesus are forced to flee, escaping real danger. Their story echoes the fears and uncertainty that still follow many families with young children around the world today.

In times like this, I often return to the wisdom of Rev. Dr. Howard Thurman, a theologian, mystic, pastor, and mentor to MLK. In a 1958 reflection titled "Canal, Reservoir, Swamp?" Thurman offers a simple but powerful way to think about how we live our lives.

He describes three ways of being. Some people live like canals, helping life and connection flow between others. Some live like reservoirs, taking in what is life-giving, holding it with care, and then offering it back when it is needed. Others become like swamps, constantly taking in but never giving out, where energy and purpose grow stagnant.

Thurman encouraged people to live as reservoirs, to develop inner depth, wisdom, and compassion so they can offer strength and blessing to the world. After Christmas, as the noise fades and a new year approaches, his question gently stays with us: what kind of life are we becoming—canal, reservoir, or swamp?
