Together

In cartoons, you sometimes see the characters moving around so fast that they're nothing but blurs. As Mark rode the big yellow bus to school one rainy day, he thought, "That's what my family is like in the morning: everybody zooming around fast in all directions. We never do anything together, like a real family."

Every morning, while Mark trotted to the corner to catch the bus, Mom whisked Dad to the commuter train, Lisa to nursery school and herself to her part-time job. They were all blurs, going every which way.

In school that day, Mark read about a pioneer family who did everything together—built a cabin, planted crops, tended animals. Mark thought, "Maybe my family could buy a farm. Then we'd do things together and be a real family."

When he came home from school, Mark smelled supper cooking. Mom and Lisa were sorting a fresh, nice-smelling stack of laundry together.

Then everyone piled in the car and went to pick up Dad at the train. As Dad slid into the seat, he laughed. "Good! It's still raining," he said. On rainy days, Dad liked to sing to the rhythm of the windshield wipers, "You are my sunshine, my only sunshine!" All four of them sang together, "You make me happy, when skies are gray!" The song hadn't quite ended when they got home, so they drove once around the block so they could finish it. As the family finally pulled into the driveway, they clapped at their performance and laughed together.

At the supper table, Mom and Dad and Mark and Lisa held hands to say the blessing together. They talked about their day.

And Mark said to himself, "We do a lot of things together. We aren't just blurs—I think we are a real family, after all!"

Helping

"It's not fair," Joanie said. "I shouldn't have to help with yard work on my sixth birthday!"

Dad smiled at Joanie and winked at Mom. "Well," he said. "Planting a tree takes a whole crew. I already have the hole dug. We'll be finished in plenty of time for the birthday celebration."

In the backyard, a young tree lay in the grass, its roots gathered into a burlap sack. "Poor thing," Mom said. "It'll feel better when it stands up."

Joanie held the heavy tree upright. Mom and Dad fussed around, getting it perfectly straight, and Joanie's arms got tired. "It isn't fair to have to help," Joanie said again, "not on my birthday."

Mom always had a saying for everything. She gave Joanie's shoulder a pat. "Helping," said Mom cheerfully, "is what families are for."

At last the tree was planted and watered. Everyone was cleaned up and ready by the time Grandma and Grandpa arrived for the birthday supper.

Of all the gifts Joanie got, her favorite was a beautiful golden-wood baseball bat. She loved baseball, and here was her very own bat. She and Dad went into the backyard for a little batting practice.

"Thanks, Dad," said Joanie. "With your help, I can be a real pro."

"That's what families are for," said Dad. He pitched a ball, and Joanie hit it with a good smack.

"Just don't hit the Joanie Tree," said Mom from the sidelines. "The Joanie Tree?" Joanie said. "Um-hmm," said Dad. "The tree is a birthday present, too. And someday, when you're ninety-six years old, you'll see that tree, tall and shady, and say, 'I helped to plant it.'"

Joanie pictured the tree reaching to the sky. "I'm glad I helped," she said. "That's what families are for."

Gifts

Curt's grandparents had an old-time porch swing, hung from the ceiling of their front porch with rusty chains. It creaked a lot, but that swing was the best place in the world to be.

Curt loved to sit in the swing between Grandma and Grandpa. Then Grandpa would recite old poems in time with the swinging. Grandpa had a wonderful gift for acting out every poem. He loved to make Grandma laugh.

Curt's favorite poem was about a ship in a storm. For this one, Grandpa made the sound of wind and waves. He'd give the swing an extra push, so they'd rock higher and higher till it seemed they'd hit the ceiling.

Grandma would laugh until she was breathless. Then she'd give Grandpa and Curt a big, strong hug. "Now, isn't life fun?" she'd ask with a sigh.

Then Grandpa died, and all of a sudden, the swing didn't feel the same. Curt and Grandma swung together, but it was an absent-minded kind of swinging, as if it didn't matter, anymore.

One day, Curt was sitting by Grandma in the swing, when he seemed to hear Grandpa's voice in his ears. He got an idea, "Maybe I can make Grandma laugh, like Grandpa used to."

Curt thought he could remember the words and actions to the storm-at-sea poem. He might not have Grandpa's gift for reciting, exactly, but he could try. Curt began to recite, and all the words came back to him like magic.

Halfway through the poem, he felt Grandma give an extra push with her feet. And pretty soon they were swinging so high, it seemed they'd rock clear up and hit the ceiling.

The poem ended, and Grandma laughed till she was breathless. It felt wonderful, making Grandma happy like that. "Thanks for your gift, Grandpa!" Curt whispered. Grandma gave him a rib-cracking hug. "Now, isn't life fun?" she asked.

We Can Talk

Kenny noticed that his mom had been wearing kind of a secret smile all day. She smiled at him, and at the cat, and even at a little piece of orange peel that fell on the kitchen floor.

When Dad came home from work, he was wearing the same kind of smile. And after supper, they said to Kenny, "We have a big surprise for you. We're going to have a new baby in our family."

Kenny stared, and his mouth fell open. A baby? There had always been three of them. Now there would be four. That was a strange idea to think about.

In bed that night, Kenny gazed up at the ceiling. A hundred thoughts seemed to run through his head, all at once. Dad came in and sat on the side of the bed. "How are you feeling tonight, Partner?" he asked Kenny.

Kenny didn't answer, for a minute. He wanted to say that he was happy about the baby coming—and he was, in one corner of his heart. But there were other feelings mixed in there, too.

Finally, he said, "I'm glad about the baby. But I feel a little sad that things will change. And I feel a little mad, I guess, that I'll have to share you and Mom with somebody else."

"Those are a lot of feelings," said Dad. "It's good that you can tell about them all." They were both quiet for a while. Then Kenny said, "I wish I could feel all happy. But I don't want things to change."

Dad nodded. "Everybody gets a little uncomfortable about changes."

"Even you?" Kenny asked. "Even me," said Dad. "Even Mom."

The next morning, Kenny checked his feelings again. They were still there, and all mixed up. But somehow, they were okay. Kenny knew he could handle them.

Growing

Alice's Uncle Carl came to visit once a year, and Alice looked forward to those visits. Uncle Carl had a gentle, old-fashioned way about him that Alice liked. She didn't know any other man who wore a hat every time he went out. What's more, he'd bow a little and tip his hat to ladies and say, "How do you do, Ma'am?" That seemed very nice.

Of course, the first thing Uncle Carl would say to Alice was, "Look at you! You're getting bigger and bigger!"

As the day came for Uncle Carl to arrive, Alice was thinking about that. Had she really grown up at all in the past year? She looked in the mirror. Well, she was certainly bigger; she had outgrown last year's clothes. But wasn't she still just a little girl?

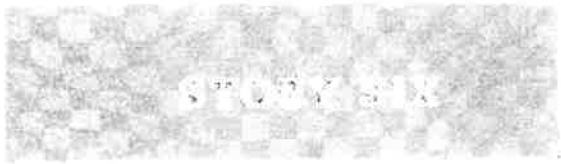

Then Alice thought: Since her uncle's last visit, she had learned to help when Mom and Dad volunteered at the homeless shelter. At the shelter, she listened and learned. She talked to homeless children and tried to understand what their lives were like. She was also learning to cook, to play soccer and to ride a two-wheeler.

Well, maybe she was more grownup, after all. She was growing in a lot of ways. The question was: Would Uncle Carl notice how she had grown up?

The big day came, and Dad brought Uncle Carl home from the airport. Alice and all her family burst out the front door to greet him.

Uncle Carl hugged Mom and patted the heads of Alice's little brothers and sisters. "Just look at you!" he said to them. "You're getting bigger and bigger!" And then Uncle Carl turned to Alice. She looked into his face. Would he see all the ways that she had grown?

He looked at her and a big smile grew on his face. Then Uncle Carl bowed a little and tipped his hat to Alice. "How do you do, Ma'am?" he said.

Stop and Think

Randy and Mike were sitting on the front steps of their apartment building. Suddenly, Mike said, "Look!" He ran down to the sidewalk and picked up a small matchbook. He opened it. "Full of matches, too!" said Mike. Mike opened the matchbook and tore out one of the matches and lit it. Then he lit another and another.

"Hey, cut it out," Randy said, feeling uncomfortable. Mike paid no attention. He was looking at a cardboard box standing at the curb, filled with paper and trash.

"Know what we could do?" Mike said. "Set the box on fire. Boy, wouldn't that be a sight?" Randy grabbed Mike by the sleeve, before he could stand up. "Hey, stop and think," he said. "Think about what?" asked Mike.

"About what could happen next," Randy said. "Like, somebody might call the fire department. That would be a false alarm, taking the fire truck away from a real fire. Mrs. Weber is old and lives all alone, and the smoke could really scare her. And the fire could spread to the whole building."

"Ah, you worry too much," said Mike. "I just wanna have a little fun." With a quick move, Randy grabbed the matches from Mike's hand and put them in his pocket. "What's fun about hurting people?" Randy asked.

Mike held a fist up to Randy's face. They looked at each other for a long minute, while both of them pictured the building where they lived, red with flame and black with ashes.

Randy watched Mike walk up the steps and disappear into the building. Suddenly, Randy felt very grown up and proud.

Make Good Choices

Look carefully at the pictures below. They tell a story. Help the children in the story make a good choice. In the empty box, draw a picture of the good choice they make.

What Is Love?

Have you ever had a “Nobody-Loves-Me” day? Everyone has. You know what it’s like: Somebody is mad at you, or maybe you’re a little bit mad at yourself. Then it can be a little hard to feel love, even for your best friend.

Angela was having that kind of day. That loving heart that was supposed to be beating in her chest—it didn’t seem to be there. Instead, there was just a cold and empty space.

That day, Angela’s class had brought in food and clothing for a needy family. The kids were going to pack everything in boxes, and then some of the parents were going to take all the things over to the family.

As they began packing, Angela’s teacher talked about showing love to everybody. Angela thought, “I don’t even know who the family is. How can I love them? Besides, today I don’t feel love for anybody.”

But a strange thing happened as Angela picked up a soft package of rice to put in the box. She suddenly pictured a child, somewhere, just like herself. A child who would thankfully eat a steaming bowl of rice, who would think, because of that food, “Somebody, somewhere, really cares about me.”

By the time the boxes were full, Angela had begun to feel something warm growing in that cold empty place.

Angela turned to her teacher. “Would it be all right if I put a note in the box?” she asked. “Good idea,” said the teacher. “Anyone who wants to can send a message of love along in the boxes.”

Angela thought it over a minute; what could she say? Before she started doing this loving work, she hadn’t felt anything at all for the family.

Now it was different. She wrote just four words: “I love you. Angela.”

We Have a New Baby

Early one morning, Kenny's Aunt Lily came to stay with him while Dad took Mom to the hospital. "Time for the baby to arrive," said Mom. "We'll give you a call when it's born." And then they drove off.

The family had done a lot of talking and planning, but still, it was hard to believe that the baby was actually going to be born. Kenny stayed inside that day, near the telephone. It finally rang. "Kenny?" said Dad's voice. "Guess what. You have a baby sister."

Kenny spent the rest of the day thinking about that. "Now you're a big brother," said Aunt Lily.

When the new baby came home from the hospital, everyone seemed to be busy all the time. Everything was different. Everybody's love and attention seemed to be going to the baby. And Kenny was thinking, "There's nothing left over for me."

The truth was, Kenny wasn't sure he liked his new sister. Then, little by little, Kenny began to feel good about being a big brother. He began to realize all the things that he could do for his sister. (That little shrimp of a baby couldn't do anything for herself, and she would sure have a lot to learn.) He would teach her.

But Kenny was learning some things, too. Girls' and boys' bodies were different, and yet, girls and boys were the same, too. He was feeling important and grown up. He was learning that when you had a new baby, there was still plenty of love to go around.

One day, Kenny went to church and stood with his family by the baptismal font. In the candlelight, he watched the water being poured on his sister's head. He felt kind of tall and strong and proud.

"I guess you're okay, after all," he thought. "Welcome, Little Sister."

Prayer Corner: Aspirations

The Catholic Church has a tradition of short prayers called aspirations. Aspirations can help us to focus on God, to deal with an anxious moment, to fall asleep, to still our busy minds. Try using aspirations this month as a family. Here are some favorites:

- Lord Jesus Christ, Son of the Living God, have mercy on me a sinner.
- Jesus, come.
- Jesus, I trust in You.
- O Jesus, I surrender myself to you, take care of everything.

Lots of Families

Liza used to think that she belonged to the smallest family you could have: two people. Just Liza and her father. They felt like a good family, and they had great times together on their dairy farm. But their family was small.

So, it was exciting when they took a long summer trip to visit her grandparents. All of a sudden, Liza was in the middle of a big family of aunts and uncles and cousins. She had known about them, of course, because they sent her letters and gifts. But until then, Liza had never been with them. Dad was always too busy with the farm.

It was like a big party all the time, with people coming and going and helping and doing everything together. On the last day of the visit, everyone gathered to have a picture taken. In the midst of all the laughing people, Liza felt warm and important and loved.

When she got back to the farm, she felt very lonely. Fall came. She went back to school, still feeling alone, still thinking of her big family.

But one day, Liza's school was working together to send food and clothing to a poor family who had lost all they owned in a fire. She was surrounded by people whose faces showed how much they cared. She felt that spark again, of being important and loved. And she thought, in surprise: "This is my family, too!"

Then, on Sunday, Liza sat next to her father in church, glancing up at his face now and then to see the special look it always had at Mass. She heard Father Ellis say, "Let us exchange the Sign of Peace."

A soft, happy current of voices seemed to roll through the pews, washing over the congregation. People hugged and shook hands and wished one another "Peace." Liza shook hands and looked into many faces warm with friendship and love. And once more, she thought: "This is my family, too!"

Making Things Right

Neither Jeannie nor her big brother, Rick, was sure how their fight started. Maybe it had begun at lunchtime. Jeannie had been telling how she was learning to dive at the park swimming pool, and her bracelet dropped off her wrist into her bowl of bean soup.

Rick roared with laughter. "Nice dive, little sister!" he said. Or maybe the fight started after lunch, when Rick was carrying out the trash. The bag split, and pea pods, coffee grounds and corncobs rained out. It was Jeannie's turn to laugh.

However it started, the big fight exploded at five o'clock, when Jeannie and Rick wanted to watch different TV shows. They yelled, and when that didn't work, they began wrestling each other for the remote control.

Mom came in and put a calming hand on each of her children. "Let's try a better way of solving this," she said. "Step Number One, say what went wrong."

First, they talked about who started the fight and who was to blame. But that didn't tell them what was wrong. And after a while, they had to agree on one thing: Neither of them had been fair to the other.

"Step Number Two," said Mom. "Say how you can make things right."

Well," said Rick, "We could flip a coin to see which TV show to watch."

"That's fair," said Jeannie.

Mom went back to her work and the children looked at each other. Then Jeannie said, "I think I know what Step Number Three is."

"Me, too," said Rick. And in chorus, they both said, "I'm sorry."

By the time Dad came home from work, everything was calm. At supper, the family joined hands to say grace.

"Nice to come home to a peaceful house," said Dad. Jeannie and Rick looked across the table at each other and grinned.

I Can Celebrate

Jesus is at Mass. I can give Jesus my love. At Mass people bring gifts to God. Some gifts are promises to do good. I give a gift.

Draw a picture of your gift to God.
