"Do as I say, not as I do." How many times have you wanted to say that to your child when caught in an awkward action? Your kids probably learn more from how you live than from what you try to teach them with your words, so be careful to set an example of integrity for them. Be careful that your speech and your actions are consistent with each other and that both consistently teach the values you want your kids to learn. Even if you think no one's looking, your kids are—and they're deciding how they'll act when no one's looking based on your actions.
