Harvard Art Museums Celebrate Brandywine Workshop and Archives with Spring 2022 Exhibition

Cambridge, MA
February 15, 2022

This spring, the Harvard Art Museums celebrate the 50th anniversary of the Brandywine Workshop and Archives—a Philadelphia-based organization with a history of introducing printmaking to practicing artists and members of the surrounding community—in an exhibition that unites innovative works by nearly 30 artists. Prints from the Brandywine Workshop and Archives: Creative Communities, on display March 4 through July 31, 2022, marks the first presentation of a group of works acquired by the museums in 2018 and honors the creative spirit of the workshop.

Founded in 1972 by artist Allan Edmunds, the Brandywine Workshop and Archives is a nonprofit cultural institution celebrated for its engagement with the local community and educational programming. For five decades, the workshop has offered arts programming in the neighborhoods of Philadelphia and sponsored printmaking residencies for both undiscovered and well-known artists. At Brandywine, collaboration and the exchange of ideas feed a culture of experimentation, in which master printers and artists continually challenge conventions of the creative process and push the technical boundaries of printmaking to produce compelling new works.

The Harvard Art Museums acquired more than 80 works by artists from the Brandywine Workshop in 2018, as part of the workshop’s initiative to place “satellite collections” in university art museums across the United States. The acquisition itself was a cooperative effort between curators and other museum colleagues as well as Harvard University students and professors, who selected works that highlight collaboration and innovation, values at the core of Brandywine’s pioneering approach. The collection spans the history of the workshop, from the early 1970s to today, and includes works by artists who had not yet found representation in the marketplace or museum collections when they arrived at Brandywine—a key constituency of the organization, which seeks to create opportunities for such artists. Harvard’s collection is also distinguished by the decision to include working proofs by some of the artists for future study by students and scholars.

“The Brandywine works in Harvard’s satellite collection have introduced new worldviews and historical perspectives into our collection of contemporary prints,” said Elizabeth M. Rudy, the museums’ Carl A. Weyerhaeuser Curator of Prints and a member of the exhibition curatorial team. “This direct engagement with urgent social, political, and cultural issues will be of interest to students and faculty across the university and to the public as well.”

Prints from the Brandywine Workshop and Archives: Creative Communities is the first major public presentation of the museums’ Brandywine collection, displaying works by nearly 30 artists: Pedro Abascal, Danny Alvarez, John Biggers, Andrea Chung, Louis Delsarte, Allan Edmunds, Rodney Ewing, Sam Gilliam, Simon Gouverneur, Sedrick Huckaby, Hughie Lee-Smith, Ibrahim Miranda, Tanya Murphy, Kenneth Noland, Odili Donald Odita, Janet Taylor Pickett, Howardena Pindell, Robert Pruitt, Faith Ringgold, Betye Saar, Eduardo Roca Salazar, Juan Sanchez, Clarissa Sligh, Pamela Phatsimo Sunstrum, Hank Willis Thomas, Larry Walker, Stanley Whitney, Deborah Willis, and Murray Zimiles

The exhibition and its associated programming were developed by a creative community on the Harvard campus that sought to emulate the generative, collaborative, and diverse environment fostered by the workshop. Colleagues in two curatorial divisions worked together on the plan: Hannah Chew, Summer 2021 SHARP Research Fellow and 2021–22 Student Assistant; Jessica Ficken, Cunningham Curatorial Assistant for the Collection; Sarah Kianovsky, Curator of the Collection; and Joelle Te Paske, Curatorial Graduate Student Intern, all from the Division of Modern and Contemporary Art; and Elizabeth M. Rudy, Carl A. Weyerhaeuser Curator of Prints; and Natalia Ángeles Vieyra, Maher Curatorial Fellow of American Art, both in the Division of European and American Art.

This core team then invited a variety of perspectives from across campus and beyond to shape the exhibition’s interpretive materials and programming. Each work on display in the gallery is accompanied by a written response from a member of museum staff, a scholar in related fields, a student, or a local artist—and their approaches are as varied as the works described. The exhibition also features a digital companion with students’ creative responses to works in the show. It will be accessible via QR code in the galleries and at hvrd.art/brandywineresponses.

“It’s been so gratifying to see our goals for the interpretive strategy come to life,” said Sarah Kianovsky, of the exhibition curatorial team. “We worked together to identify partners who would be interested in the exhibition, the prints, and their subject matter for future teaching and research, taking it all one step further by inviting them to contribute their perspectives directly on the gallery walls and in exhibition materials. Their responses to the works have been even more rich and varied than we could have hoped for.”
The exhibition will feature a wide range of colorful prints, from individual prints to large multipart installations. An in-gallery video will show archival footage provided by the Brandywine Workshop as well as short interviews with many of the artists. Notable works include:

- Nigerian-born Odili Donald Odita’s offset lithograph Cut (2016)—comprised of shards of bright colors that emanate from a diagonal axis—is directly related to the large outdoor mural Our House, which the artist painted on the facade of the Brandywine Workshop building in 2015.

- Me as Me (unframed) (2011), a powerful four-part print by Botswanan artist Pamela Phatsimo Sunstrum that shows two life-size figures—representations of Sunstrum’s alter ego Asme—challenging appropriation and misrepresentation of Black female bodies.

- Wissahickon (1975), a complex abstract screenprint by Sam Gilliam, the first artist to join the workshop’s artist-in-residence series.

- An installation of the 101 intimate portraits that make up Sedrick Huckaby’s series The 99% - Highland Hills (2012–13), which depicts individuals from the artist’s community in Fort Worth, TX. The artist will collaborate with Harvard students on the installation.

- A selection of lithographs from Murray Zimiles’s portfolio Holocaust (1987), showing the horrors of the genocide carried out by the Nazis against Jewish people and other minority groups during World War II.

On view in the museums’ Special Exhibitions Gallery on Level 3, Prints from the Brandywine Workshop and Archives: Creative Communities will run concurrently with another special exhibition, White Shadows: Anneliese Hager and the Camera-less Photograph, the first to focus on the role of women makers in the history of the photogram.
