Charters were able to create other entities that could be seen as needed. Since its inception, the United Nations has Other service providers as well as agencies. There are numerous subsidiary agencies, including committees, committees, boards, committees, panels and working groups, some of which are included in the list. This list is a work in progress and should be cross-checked with other sources. (A more comprehensive list can be found in the United Nations System Document.) UN professional bodies include: • FAO - Food and Agriculture Organization. • ICAO - International Civil Aviation Organization. • IFAD - International Fund for Agricultural Development. • ILO - International Labour Organization. • IMP - International Monetary Fund. • IMO - International Maritime Organization. The United Nations has and supports professional organizations and institutions. They are different from programs and funds in that they are led by the Executive Committee of member states separately from the General Assembly. Sometimes they are in their member states without reporting to the General Assembly or the Security Council. Some of these institutions also preceded the United Nations, as was the case with the ITU, which was formed in 1865 to manage international treaties, and the ILO, which was created as part of the International Federation.
