Through the essay the author communicates his views on a certain subject to the reader. The art of writing texts in this genre presupposes a refined ability to compare different sources of information, clearly communicate to the reader their opinion and worldview and consistently substantiate their point of view. For this it is necessary to think independently in each separate fragment of your work of the genre of the essay.

In contrast to the novel or story, the essay does not apply to fiction, so it is successfully used as a tool for learning. Teachers from American and British institutions of higher education use it for a weekly assessment of how much the learner has learned the course. The main goal of this exercise is to learn how to logically build arguments, leading to final conclusions. For the most part, such an use of essays occurs in the faculties of the humanities.

In our country, the essay came only as a monitoring tool within the USE. Unfortunately, widely enough essays on the model of Western countries in schools and universities in Russia are taking root with difficulty. The Soviet past, with its ideological pressure and direct instruction on how to treat this or that subject, almost completely destroyed the writing of works in the genre of essays in schools, replacing them with standard works that did not teach the art of thinking at all. The education of today must be based on ensuring that students do not retell the books, but compare what is written in them and join the discussion of the problem, setting forth their own thoughts.
