Any document containing factual evidence related to the trial is known as an affidavit or affidavit. This document is signed and sealed in the presence of a public official, such as a public notary. Declarant is sworn in to ensure that the information and facts presented to him in his affidavit are true and honest. The oath of office is made on stamp paper with the help of the court. Such documents can be written in the third person or from depending on who is drafting the document. If the lawyer prepares an affidavit on behalf of his client, the document will be written in the third person, while if the declarant himself develops the affidavit, sworn, will be drawn up in the first person. In some countries, when the declarant is not available for cross-examination in court, he or she may testify under oath and have a lawyer represent him on the basis of that document. However, sworn testimony is accepted by the court only if there is a genuine reason why the declarant cannot be brought to trial. If the declarant cannot be found incapacitated or dead only then the court will accept such affidavits. Why do you need an affidavit? A affidavit is required for many legal purposes. Affidavits are required for visas, school and college admissions, property cases, divorce cases, debt cases, mass transfers, and so on. These documents carry some important and factual information that is required by the court or the government organization that the declarant submits the document. Sworn testimony is necessary for both business and legal purposes. Depending on the purpose of the affidavit, the declarant may or may not need a notary document. Thus, sworn testimony is an important legal document, which is often held as evidence or evidence in court, and also carries important personal information about the declarant. Declarant.
