“Montessori.” The word alone can conjure images of overanxious parents jostling to get their 3-year-old into an expensive, exclusive preschool in order to ensure the child’s future success. Yet, the hype often obscures what Maryland educators and parents continue to find: A Montessori education, with its emphasis on engaging children by tapping into their innate curiosity, remains a powerful method for developing students who can think deeply and independently.

Features of Montessori

An educational philosophy developed by Dr. Maria Montessori at the turn of the last century, the Montessori method incorporates a number of unique features.

One of those is the mixed-age classroom, in which children spanning two or more commonly three grades are grouped together. Lainie Santos Torres, curriculum coordinator at Love of Learning Montessori School in Columbia, said that while they’re sometimes misunderstood as children teaching children, in practice mixed-age classrooms are effective because they allow children to not only solidify their learning by sharing it with other students, but also to gain exposure to the concept of mentoring.

“If you look at a lot of the big-name companies of today … they’re using a lot of [mentorship] models,” Torres said. “To have children do it is really just modeling real life.”

Another feature of Montessori schools is the specially prepared environment. Each classroom is filled with sensory objects that aid in learning, and students make choices regarding both what they want to work with and for how long, said Tamara Sheesley Balis, head of the Montessori School in Lutherville.

“Our children have three hours to go into the depths of their explorations and discoveries,” she said.

The uninterrupted work time allows children to build self-esteem by allowing for challenges, Balis said. “We want them to learn to persevere and to keep working, even if it’s hard.”

And teachers are trained not to intervene when a student is deeply involved in an activity.

Above all, the Montessori method places the child, rather than the instructor, at the center of the learning process. While the teacher ensures each student receives education in all required subjects, “the student provides the inspiration and excitement,” Elizabeth Whitaker, administrative director of the Montessori International Children’s House in Annapolis, wrote in an email. Teachers act as guides, rather than sources of knowledge.

Montessori proponents are confident in the wide applicability of the method. “Most children are Montessori children,” Balis said.

Family matters

For many Maryland Montessori schools, the admissions process begins when the parent of a prospective student visits the school and observes a classroom. While the child also will be evaluated for fit with the school, generally through a visit and possibly an interview, parents must “have faith in the methodology,” Torres said. The first step is seeing the methodology in action.

That belief in the method is important because the school and the family will work together in a child’s education. “The first step is seeing the methodology in action. That belief in the method is important because the school and the family will work together in a child’s education,” Torres said.

In return, families benefit from schools that work to support them. Many Montessori programs offer before- or after-school care that are a boon to working parents whose schedules don’t conform to the average school day.

Families also can tap into what their children are learning and bring lessons into the household.

“We develop a very close working partnership with the family,” said Annesse Family School’s founder, Andrew Knutt, is shown right.

Students at the Montessori International Children’s House in Annapolis provide the inspiration for their instruction, Administrative Director Elizabeth Whitaker says. Teachers there act as guides, rather than sources of knowledge.

Montessori still a strong alternative

A century-old philosophy of learning remains relevant, popular with parents and educators.

There's still a place for art in STEM

The push is on for science and math, but arts education remains important.

The arts open up understanding of just about everything. They can be the key to opening up a whole new understanding with kids.

The arts open up understanding of just about everything. They can be the key to opening up a whole new understanding with kids.

Key School dance teacher Jayne Karsten was performing an online search when she came across a former student's blog.

The student recalled when Karsten showed her class how writing is like a dance: After taking a few steps, she let the class imagine how they would finish the piece.

"Ms. Karsten taught me about an interconnectedness of skills and organization," the former student wrote.

Karsten was startled her lecture had resonated so well that the student had remembered the analogy for decades. She was not surprised, however, by the ways in which arts education has an extraordinary impact on students' lives.

"The arts open up understanding of just about everything," she said. They "can be the key to opening up a whole new understanding with kids."

The Key School, which offers arts programs from pre-K through 12th grade, is nationally recognized for its Orff Schwerk music program. Students in the early to middle section learn daily about various aspects of musical education, including speech, rhythm and creative movement.

"It really is a wonderful program," she said. "The Orff program encourages imagination and taps, early on, different things within students that they maybe didn't even know they had."

Visual arts including photography, drawing, ceramics, theater, voice and instruments also are part of the high school curricula. Ancillary benefits abound.

The arts "help create a vibrancy in the school," she said. "It encourages students to find their passion or find their talent," Micciche said.

"It gives them a reason to be excited about school," he said. "The pride that they get from having their work displayed is really powerful," Micciche said. "It reminds them to keep at it and deepens their engagement in art."

Montessori >> State to begin validating alternative program

Andrew Kutt, founder and head of the Oneness-Family School in Chevy Chase, says lessons in topics including conflict resolution can be taught and enriched by students’ families at home.

Montessori is a method that grew to attain its current level of worldwide popularity, in some ways fell victim to its own success. Torres said that because the methodology is not patented, until very recently anyone could open a so-called “Montessori” school or daycare, regardless of his or her credentials, training or knowledge of the learning materials.

In Maryland, however, the state Department of Education has put in place new requirements to ensure the quality of Montessori schools throughout the region. By July 1, 2015, all schools claiming the term “Montessori” must be validated by a state-approved validating organization. According to the department’s website, schools will be evaluated on “teacher qualifications, written curriculum, instructional methods and materials.”

Even with such a process in place, variation will occur. Balis said Dr. Montessori had not fully developed her infant, middle school and high school curriculums at the time of her death in 1952, so those areas continue to mature.

The nature of a method that respects children as individuals with their own ways of learning means that each child’s experience will be distinctive. Ultimately, parents must take the time to evaluate the course offerings of individual schools and make the decision to enroll based on their confidence in the school and their own understanding of their child. Nothing can replace a school visit, especially given the longstanding misperception that “Montessori” must be validated by a judicial committee, which handles all alleged infractions of school rules and on which all students serve in turn.

Waldorf school education

The first Waldorf School was established in Stuttgart, Germany, in 1919; the method made its way to New York City in 1928. At the Washington Waldorf School in Bethesda, children’s essays and illustrations become their own personalized textbooks, class teacher Jack Petrash said. Other attributes of a Waldorf education include a teacher who stays with the same group of students from first through eighth grade, block lessons in which the first two hours of the day are devoted to in-depth study of a single topic for three to four weeks at a time and a pre-kindergarten/kindergarten curriculum given over in large part to imaginative play.

Arts-integrated education

At the Lucey School in Middletown, the arts are “integral to students’ entire academic and creative evolution,” founding director Victoria Brown wrote in an email. The school’s multi-sensory approach combines project-based learning, improvisational drama, and the aesthetics of nature to actively involve children in their own education, and is effective for a wide range of learning styles.

About our schools guide

The following pages list independent primary and secondary schools in the state of Maryland, including both secular and religious schools that are not part of the state’s public school systems. The list is based on information provided by the website of the Maryland State Department of Education (MSDE) and by the schools themselves. In many cases we talked to school representatives; in some cases we relied on school websites.

Tuition figures are the latest available. Many schools had not set fees for 2012-2013 when we gathered this information, and schools often charge extra fees that are not considered part of tuition. We recommend that readers contact schools directly to check on tuition and to ask about additional fees, enrollment policies and waiting lists.

Readers also should be aware that just because the state licenses a school to teach certain grades, that does not mean all of those grades are offered.

It is important to us (and to our readers) to keep the information in this semi-annual guide as accurate as possible. Please bring any discrepancies to our attention by emailing the special publications editor at Tara.Buck@TheDailyRecord.com.
