DEAN'S MESSAGE

STEVE EXUM

Martin H. Brinkley

Dear Carolina Law Family,

The year ahead is exciting and important for Carolina Law.

Since becoming dean 18 months ago, I have watched and listened, feeling the pulse of our community in Chapel Hill and talking to alumni and other stakeholders about our fine school. I have taken stock of our needs and welcomed conversations about our hopes for the future. Now the time has come for the kind of serious planning that will build up and sustain Carolina Law for decades to come.

Beginning this fall, we have embarked on a strategic planning process that will take the law school forward. Jeff Hirsch, Geneva Yeargan Rand Distinguished Professor of Law, who recently completed three years of service as Associate Dean for Academic Affairs, has agreed to serve as Associate Dean for Strategy. We have retained Paul Friga, a faculty member at the Kenan-Flagler Business School and a former management consultant at McKinsey & Company, to provide independent, data-driven expertise and analysis in support of our deliberations. Paul, who will be supported by a group of student analysts, has done similar strategic planning work for several other units within UNC-Chapel Hill – most recently, the College of Arts and Sciences. I have appointed a task force to design the strategic planning process under Paul's guidance. The process will seek input from faculty, students, alumni and other constituencies. We anticipate completing the process by late spring of 2017. I urge each of you to offer your insights and views when we seek them, as we surely will. Our future will only be as good as we all make it.

Early in the fall semester, Associate Dean for Advancement Kris Davidson informed me of her decision to accept an appointment as an associate vice chancellor in the development office at the University of North Carolina at Greensboro. Kris's contributions to Carolina Law over her six-year tenure were extraordinary. We were sad to lose her, even as we celebrated the strong endorsement of her skills and achievements this opportunity represented. We are therefore in the process of searching for an associate dean to lead our advancement and alumni affairs office. Charles Plambeck '86 and Associate Dean Jeff Hirsch are co-chairing a search committee that contains a number of alumni representatives. Finding the right associate dean is critical as we endeavor to involve alumni more intimately in the daily work of the law school and look forward to a pan-University capital campaign.

Our strategic planning process and the search for a new associate dean are closely linked. Our strategy will determine the initiatives for which we will seek support from you. I am excited about the conversations and creativity to come.

Meanwhile, the daily life of the law school goes on. In August we welcomed an outstanding first-year class of 214 students, together with six new faculty members who are already doing splendid work in our classrooms.

We welcome your visits, your messages, your feedback and your ideas about the work of your law school.

Yours sincerely,

Martin H. Brinkley

Carolina Law Launches Veterans Legal Assistance Project to Meet Needs of Military Veterans

Starting this year, some North Carolina military veterans will have a new option for legal services related to disability compensation and discharge upgrade petitions.

Carolina Law launched its Veterans Legal Assistance in January to meet civil needs related to military service. The project will build on pro bono services that students in Carolina Law's Veterans Advocacy Legal Organization (VALOR) have provided with wills and other needs.

"As a group, veterans in North Carolina, like veterans nationwide, struggle with serious unmet legal needs," says Jessica Marsden, an Equal Justice Works fellow who is supervising the project. "And UNC law students have been eager for a veterans' clinic. There is a lot of enthusiasm about providing legal services to folks who have served our country."

The veterans' initiative will offer students "hands-on legal experience with more complex cases in a highly supervised setting," Marsden says.

The project will broaden access to legal services for low-income veterans, particularly those whose discharge status prevents them from receiving veterans' benefits or finding civilian employment.

"Veterans with other-than-honorable discharges — as well as bad conduct and dishonorable discharges — are generally ineligible for most Veterans Affairs benefits, including disability compensation for service-connected disabilities," Marsden says. "A less-than-fully-honorable discharge can also be stigmatizing."

Employers can find out the nature of a veteran's discharge, and an other-than-honorable discharge can be an obstacle to landing work.

Carolina Law will mainly represent veterans who want discharge upgrades through the military boards, part of the Department of Defense.

"If a veteran is successful, the discharge upgrade process can be used to change both the character of service and the narrative reason for discharge," Marsden says.

For veterans whose discharge upgrade applications are successful, law students will help file benefits applications.

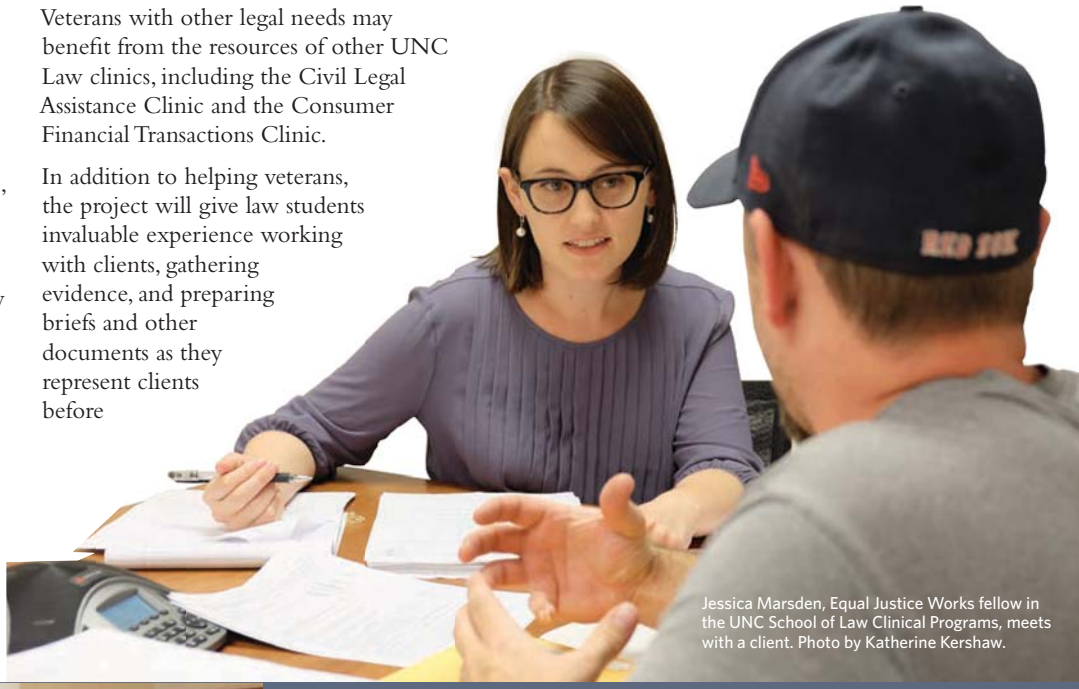

Veterans with other legal needs may benefit from the resources of other UNC Law clinics, including the Civil Legal Assistance Clinic and the Consumer Financial Transactions Clinic.

In addition to helping veterans, the project will give law students invaluable experience working with clients, gathering evidence, and preparing briefs and other documents as they represent clients before federal administrative agencies.

"Students may also appear in person before military boards if their clients have the opportunity for a personal hearing. This type of hands-on experience is one of the best ways for law students to develop skills they will need when they graduate and go on to legal practice," Marsden says.

Marsden is getting referrals from lawyers and organizations that serve veterans, screening prospective clients and gathering records connected with claims. She will do more outreach at veteran's centers in Greensboro and Fayetteville.

Alumni and Students Celebrate Career Night in September

On September 22, 209 students and 84 attorneys including 62 alumni enjoyed an evening of career and practice exploration in the rotunda. Career Night gives students the opportunity to speak with attorneys in a variety of practice areas and learn about diverse career paths while building their professional network in an informal setting. If you or your employer would like to participate in the next Career Night, please contact Maria Mangano, director of career development at 919.843.5658 or mangano@unc.edu or Lynn Boone, director of diversity initiatives at 919.843.7560 or lhboone@eamil.unc.edu.

Holderness International Moot Court Team Represents Carolina Law at Middle Temple in London

In October, the Holderness International Moot Court Team, featuring 2L students Andrew Simpson, Emma Chase, Siya Hegde and Ashlee Suttle, traveled to England as part of an exchange program between Carolina Law and British barristers-in-training at the Middle Temple Society in London. Professor Richard Myers '98, Bev Sizemore, director of international and LL.M. programs, and Dean Martin H. Brinkley '92 accompanied the team. During the trip, Carolina Law students learned about the British legal system, competed in moot court sessions and celebrated Middle Temple's Grand Day at a black tie dinner on October 20. This trip marks Professor Myers's second year as the American faculty moot court judge for the sessions. Dean Brinkley also participated in the week's events and served as the moot court judge for the final moot court session.

Judge Frank D. Whitney '87 Celebrates Constitution Day at Carolina Law on Sept. 16

To mark this year's Constitution Day celebration, Judge Frank D. Whitney '87 discussed a well-known case he was involved with while serving as the United States Attorney for the Eastern District of North Carolina. In a presentation titled, "United States v. North Carolina's Original Copy of the Bill of Rights: The historic Journey in the Theft and Recovery of North Carolina's Copy of the Bill of Rights," Judge Whitney discussed details of the case, the timeline of events and the significance of the recovery.

During the presentation, he said, "I am honored to be here to talk about the greatest case of my life. There is no way I will ever have another case like this. This is my Scopes Monkey Trial. This is the trial that I will be proud of—well not the trial but the long investigation."

Katherine Kershaw

The presentation was in honor of Constitution Day which is traditionally held on September 17 to celebrate and commemorate the day on which the Constitution of the United States was signed. For the past several years, UNC School of Law has served as the host of the campus-wide UNC-Chapel Hill Constitution Day celebration mandated by a 2004 federal statute. Because Constitution Day fell on a Saturday, the University celebrated the federal observance on Friday.

Judge Whitney is the current Chief United States District Judge for the Western District of N.C. He has served as both an Assistant United States Attorney and United States Attorney. He is a co-author of "Federal Money Laundering: Crimes and Forfeitures."

WELCOME to the CLASS OF 2019!

Katherine Kershaw

In August, Carolina Law welcomed 214 new students, including exchange students from England, France, Germany, Hong Kong, The Netherlands and Spain.

We also welcomed 12 LL.M. students from China, Germany, India, Japan, Kazakhstan, Mexico, Mongolia and Saudi Arabia.

Our new students represent 93 undergraduate institutions.

Eleven students have graduate degrees.

Sixty-six percent are North Carolina residents and 34 percent are from out-of-state.

Twelve students come from science and engineering backgrounds.

Nine students came from Teach For America and nine are from AmeriCorps.

We have seven students with military backgrounds.

Twenty-two percent of our students identify as racially diverse.

All are future Tar Heel lawyers.

Josephine Kim and Nick Hanna Lead Carolina Law's Holderness 3L Team to Victory in Negotiation Competition

Negotiating a good deal for a client isn't easy. And the terrain shifts in each case, based not only on the facts but also on factors such as the personality and temperament of the opposing counsel.

Those were among the takeaways for UNC School of Law third-year students Josephine Kim and Nick Hanna, who used their deal-making skills to place first in the American Bar Association Southeast Negotiation Competition this fall.

The tournament was at the University of Georgia School of Law, and Hanna and Kim represented Carolina Law's Holderness 3L National Negotiation Team.

The competition tested their skills in teamwork and negotiation planning and ethics, flexibility in adapting strategies and other factors considered by the judges.

"Not all our opponents treated us the same or approached the problems as we did, and it was a fun challenge navigating that," Hanna says.

"Smooth talking and a silver tongue may work on some but anger others," Hanna says. "Being firm with some may just upset them and have them refuse to work with you. Appealing to others' empathy may get you farther along than strictly dealing with the facts."

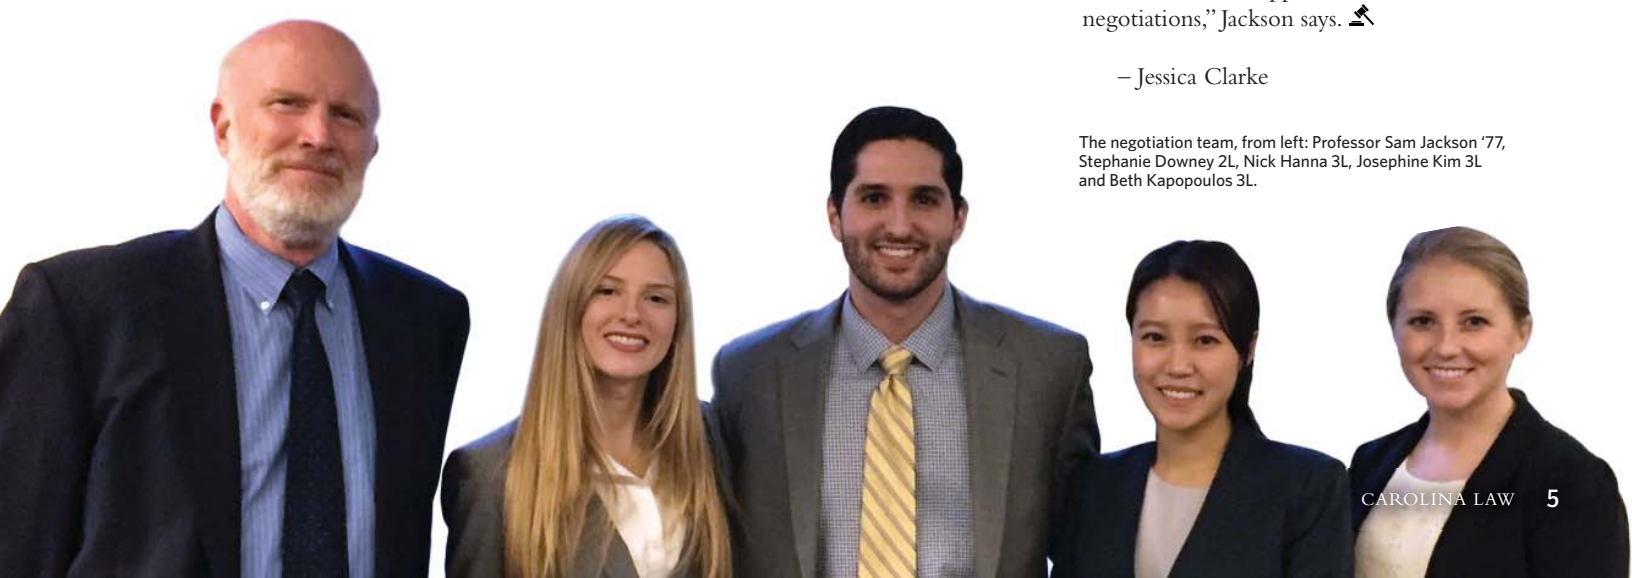

"Since the fact patterns put our clients at a disadvantage, we brainstormed creative ideas that could give us leverage in the negotiations," Kim says. "We also made sure our monetary deals and creative solutions were supported by justifications."

"I learned that an advantageous deal for your client does not necessarily correspond to a successful negotiation," she notes. "It's important to realize your opposing counsel is also just trying to do their job."

Carolina Law adjunct professor Sam Jackson '77, the team's faculty adviser, was impressed by their performance.

"Josephine and Nick proved well-prepared, articulate and unflappable in their negotiations," Jackson says.

Catherine Kim Receives Eric K. Yamamoto Emerging Scholar Award

UNC School of Law Associate Professor Catherine Kim focuses on the role that administrative agencies and courts have in social justice reform, especially for communities of immigrants and people of color.

For her scholarly achievements, Kim received the Eric K. Yamamoto Emerging Scholar Award, given annually to junior scholars by the Conference of Asian Pacific American Law Faculty (CAPALF). She was presented the award at CAPALF's national conference, held in April at the University of California-Davis. CAPALF members nominate award recipients.

Yamamoto, who teaches at the William S. Richardson School of Law at the University of Hawaii at Manoa, is known for his work in civil rights, civil procedure and social justice reform. He was on the legal team that worked to overturn the conviction of Fred Korematsu, who challenged the constitutionality of the World War II internment of Japanese Americans.

"My scholarship has examined doctrinal shifts diminishing the ability of federal courts to remedy systemic civil rights violations. More recently, I have focused on the potential for executive-branch actors to address these issues," Kim said. "For example, I have analyzed the role of administrative agencies in protecting immigrant interests, as well as the role of the president in combating anti-discrimination.

"Through my scholarship, I seek to identify the potential for new and emerging mechanisms of civil rights reform."

Kathleen Thomas Presents Research Findings at U.S. Department of Treasury

Applying the psychology of taxpayer behavior could increase compliance with tax law, and U.S. Department of Treasury officials have more insight on strategies, thanks to research by UNC School of Law Assistant Professor Kathleen Thomas.

Last June, Thomas was invited to present two of her published papers to economists at the Treasury's Office of Tax Analysis. The papers propose ways the government could improve compliance and decrease tax evasion through behavioral economics.

Thomas's paper "Presumptive Collection: A Prospect Theory Approach to Increasing Small Business Tax Compliance," published in Tax Law Review in 2013, focuses on self-employed taxpayers who don't pay their taxes through withholding.

"They asked incredibly insightful questions that gave me a new perspective on my own research and some insights to carry forward to future projects. I am usually presenting my work to other law professors, so it was an enlightening experience to share ideas with those directly involved in government," Thomas said.

While at the Treasury, she also discussed her future research projects and learned more about some government research. One of her new projects, with co-author Jay Soled of Rutgers University, will examine possible government regulation of tax-return preparation software.

"Because I am interested in how tax preparation software might play a role in improving taxpayer compliance, I was very interested to learn about some of the collaboration that already goes on between Treasury and the tax-software industry," Thomas said.

Another new project focuses on low-income taxpayers who claim the earned-income tax credit and other government benefits.

"Improving the process for low-income taxpayers is another area where economists at the Treasury have dedicated attention, and I look forward to learning more about their ongoing research and relying upon it to inform my own work," Thomas said.

Holning Lau, UNC School of Law professor and associate dean for faculty development, calls Thomas's invitation to the Treasury "a great honor" and cites other recent faculty achievements. "We at Carolina Law are proud that our junior faculty members are garnering such well-deserved attention for their important research projects."

Carolina Law Welcomes Six New Faculty Members and Names New Chair Appointments

UNC SCHOOL OF LAW WELCOMED SIX NEW FULL-TIME FACULTY MEMBERS THIS YEAR. THE NEW FACULTY INCLUDE:

Kevin Bennardo
Clinical Associate Professor of Law (RRWA/WLRC)

Kevin Bennardo teaches Research, Reasoning, Writing and Advocacy at UNC School of Law. Before his appointment at UNC, he held faculty positions at the Indiana University Robert H. McKinney School of Law, the Louisiana State University Paul M. Hebert Law Center, and the University of Richmond School of Law. He has taught courses in the areas of legal analysis, research, and communication, criminal sentencing, and trusts & estates. In 2016, the students at IU-McKinney Law voted Bennardo the recipient of the Red Cane Award.

Andrew Hessick
Professor of Law

Andy Hessick teaches Evidence, Federal Jurisdiction and Remedies, and his research interests include federal courts, administrative law, remedies and criminal sentencing. Prior to joining the faculty at UNC School of Law, Hessick was a professor at the University of Utah and Arizona State University and was a visiting assistant professor at Boston University. Before beginning teaching, he served as a Bristow Fellow in the U.S. Solicitor General's office during President George W. Bush's second term and practiced litigation at Kellogg Huber Hansen Todd Evans & Figel PLLC in Washington, D.C.

Eisha Jain
Assistant Professor of Law

Eisha Jain teaches Criminal Law and Criminal Law as Civil Regulation. Her research focuses on the blurring boundaries between civil and criminal law. Her most recent publications are Arrests as Regulation, published by the Stanford Law Review and Prosecuting Collateral Consequences, published by the Georgetown Law Journal. Jain previously practiced for several years as a criminal defense and civil rights lawyer. She also previously clerked on the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit.

Kate Elengold
Clinical Associate Professor of Law (Consumer Financial Transactions Clinic)

Kate Elengold is a clinical associate professor of law and director of the Consumer Financial Transactions Clinic. Her research interests lie at the intersection of race, gender and poverty. Her most recent scholarship focuses on issues related to racialized sexual harassment in housing. Prior to joining the Carolina Law faculty, Elengold taught the Women and the Law Clinic and Legal Ethics at American University Washington College of Law.

Carissa Byrne Hessick
Anne Shea Ransdell and William Garland "Buck" Ransdell Jr. Distinguished Professor of Law

Hessick teaches Criminal Law, Professional Responsibility, and Current Topics in Criminal Justice. Before joining the faculty at Carolina Law, Hessick taught on the faculties at Arizona State University's Sandra Day O'Connor College of Law and the University of Utah's S.J. Quinney College of Law. After graduating from law school, she clerked for Judge A. Raymond Randolph on the D.C. Circuit. She also spent two years as a Climenko Fellow at Harvard Law School.

Jonas J. Monast
C. Boyden Gray Distinguished Fellow and Assistant Professor of Law

Jonas Monast is the inaugural C. Boyden Gray Distinguished Fellow at Carolina Law. He co-directs the Center on Climate, Energy, Environment & Economics (CE^3). He teaches Energy Law and Natural Resources Law. Monast's work focuses on the interaction of federal and state energy policies, aligning energy and environmental policy goals, and regulatory options for reducing greenhouse gas emissions.

IN ADDITION TO THE NEW FACULTY MEMBERS, UNC SCHOOL OF LAW ALSO NAMED THREE NEW CHAIR APPOINTMENTS:

Patricia L. Bryan
Henry P. Brandis Distinguished Professor of Law

Maxine Eichner
Graham Kenan Distinguished Professor of Law

Holning Lau
Reef C. Ivey, II Distinguished Professor of Law

Carolina Law Announces Faculty Awards

UNC School of Law presented three awards to distinguished faculty on Thursday, April 21, in a ceremony at the Paul J. Rizzo Conference Center.

The awards presented included:

The Robert G. Byrd Award for Excellence and Creativity in Teaching, awarded to Richard S. Saver, Arch T. Allen Distinguished Professor of Law. The Byrd Award is named for Robert G. Byrd, an alumnus of the school who served as a member of the faculty from 1963 until 2004, and as dean from 1974 to 1979.

The James H. Chadbourn Award for Excellence in Scholarship, awarded to W. Mark C. Weidemaier, Ralph M. Stockton Jr. Distinguished Scholar and Associate Professor of Law. The Chadbourn Award is named for James H. Chadbourn, editor-in-chief of the North Carolina Law Review in 1930-1931, a member of the UNC Law faculty from 1931 to 1936, and a co-author of leading texts in civil procedure, federal court and evidence while serving on the Harvard Law School faculty. In 1933, while at UNC, Chadbourn bravely authored a controversial work titled "Lynching and the Law." This award honors a faculty member's distinguished law journal article.

The Charles E. Daye Award for Excellence in Service, awarded to Erika K. Wilson, Assistant Professor of Law. This award is conferred annually on the basis of service performed within the two years prior to the year in which the award is given. A faculty member is honored for exemplary public service, measured by the time, effort and creativity devoted to service, as well as the impact on the community.

At the ceremony, S. Elizabeth Gibson '76, Burton Craige Professor of Law, was also recognized for her 33 years of service to the law school. Gibson retired in June.

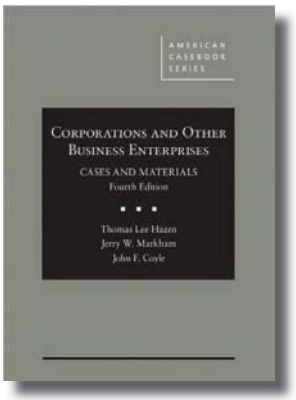

Kristen Chavez

Michael Gerhardt, Samuel Ashe Distinguished Professor of Constitutional Law and director of the Program in Law and Government, and National Public Radio's legal correspondent, Nina Totenberg, discuss the Supreme Court justice confirmation process and history at the 2016-17 Frey Lecture on September 20 in Memorial Hall.

UNC Center for Civil Rights Argues Appeal in Halifax County Education Case

On September 19 the UNC Center for Civil Rights argued the appeal of a groundbreaking education law case, Silver v. Halifax County Board of Commissioners, at the North Carolina Court of Appeals. The primary focus of the argument was that boards of county commissioners share in the state constitutional obligation to ensure schoolchildren have the opportunity to secure a sound basic education. In a courtroom packed with concerned residents from Halifax County, a classroom of middle school students from the community, and several UNC School of Law students and faculty, Managing Attorney Mark Dorosin '94 argued the case before Chief Judge Linda McGee '73, Judge Donna Stroud and Judge Lucy Inman '90.

In August 2015, the Coalition for Education and Economic Security (CEES), the Halifax County Branch of the NAACP, and three parents and guardians of schoolchildren in Halifax County filed the case, asserting that the county commissioners' allocation of resources among three racially segregated and low performing school districts in the small county violated the right of students to receive a sound basic education, as guaranteed by the North Carolina Constitution (and affirmed by the North Carolina Supreme Court in the landmark Leandro education cases). The county commissioners insisted that the Halifax County educational system complies with the constitutional and statutory obligations to provide critical educational resources to their residents.

"The center has been working with community organizations in Halifax to address educational inequities and the continuing legacy of discrimination for more than five years."

In the complaint, the plaintiffs highlighted the adverse educational impacts and outcomes that result from the county's ineffective distribution of resources among the districts, which predictably produces inequitable access to critical educational needs like learning materials, curricular offerings, safe and adequate facilities, and certified, high quality teachers and principals. The complaint also asserts that the persistent racial division among the districts stigmatizes children in a manner that further impedes equitable educational opportunities.

"The center has been working with community organizations in Halifax to address educational inequities and the continuing legacy of discrimination for more than five years," said Dorosin. "Our work in Halifax is the model of our community-based lawyering and direct grassroots engagement, and has included both advocacy-based research and research-based advocacy. Because the center does not get state money, the support from private donors, foundations, and others that are committed to social justice is critical to us being able to continue this work."

For links to the complaint and the appeal briefs, click on the Halifax tab on the center's blog, http://blogs.law.unc.edu/civilrights/

Center for Media Law and Policy Celebrates the First Amendment

Professor Mary-Rose Papandrea speaks at the First Amendment Day celebration.

On September 27, the Center for Media Law and Policy led the University in its annual First Amendment Day celebration. This campus-wide, day-long event is designed to both celebrate the First Amendment and explore its role in the lives of Carolina students. The center organized nearly a dozen panels and other activities featured throughout the day.

Trevor Timm, co-founder and executive director of the Freedom of the Press Foundation, delivered the keynote address on the topic of "The First Amendment in the Age of Tech Giants." Timm is a journalist, activist and lawyer who writes a twice weekly column for The Guardian on privacy, free speech and national security. He has also contributed to The Atlantic, Al

Center for Banking and Finance Awards Student Scholarships and Introduces New Financial Services Compliance Program

The Center for Banking and Finance at UNC School of Law significantly increased its financial support for students in 2016 and broke new ground with an inaugural Financial Services Compliance Boot Camp.

For the center's 20th annual North Carolina Banking Institute held last spring, eight 2L students on the North Carolina Banking Institute Journal's editorial board each received a $3,000 scholarship for their third year of law school. That was in addition to two scholarships of about $7,200 each the center gives annually to two students involved with the journal, which published its 20th volume in 2016. The awards are supported by sponsors of the annual Banking Institute program.

"The eight rising 3L students were not aware this would happen. So, it was great to see their expressions when the awards were announced and to note sponsors' satisfaction in seeing their support used for this purpose," center director Lissa Broome says.

Depending on the amount of support from sponsors, she hopes to award scholarships annually to rising 3L editors.

In another new initiative, the center gave a $500 grant from its International Enrichment Fund to support 2L Bernard Botchway's attendance at the World Bank Group Youth Summit in November in Washington, D.C.

"We are prepared to entertain requests for funds from students to assist in international enrichment, particularly related to banking and finance issues," Broome says.

Another international-focused initiative is the center's annual $5,000 study abroad scholarship for a rising 2L student to focus on business, banking or finance. Kinsey Johnson received the 2016 Summer Study Abroad Scholarship and studied in Vienna.

Back in North Carolina, the center's financial services compliance event, for young compliance professionals in the banking and securities industries, was held in Charlotte in August.

Through the program, the center expanded its scope by providing continuing education by reaching a more diverse group, given that many attendees weren't attorneys. Broome hopes that the next session can include law students interested in learning more about compliance careers.

The center also supports students' career exploration with two annual events.

During fall break, students participated in the annual Career Trek program which introduces students to attorneys who work in private practice and in-house positions at banks. This year's program was hosted by Wells Fargo and Womble Carlyle in Charlotte. Students were given the opportunity to learn more about career paths, receive tips about how to search for jobs and make a good impression in their summer or permanent jobs.

Students also get to participate in a lunch during orientation for the North Carolina Banking Institute Journal which allows students to network with alumni who discus their day-to-day work, provide advice on students' resumes and offer job hunting suggestions. "We hope it exposes students to career opportunities they may not have considered and helps them start building their professional networks," Broome says.

Professor David Ardia moderated the panel titled "Cyberbullying, Free Speech, and School Discipline: Can We Protect Students in Constitutional and Just Ways?" The panelists included Barbara Fedders, co-director of the law school's Youth Justice Clinic; Susanna Birdsong, policy counsel for the ACLU-NC; Jen Story '11, supervising attorney for Legal Aid of North Carolina's Advocates for Children Services; and Chanda Marlowe, a former high school teacher and current fourth year J.D./M.A. media law student.

Amanda Martin '92 moderated the panel titled "Student Journalists, Carolina's New General Counsel, and Public Records." The panel discussed the importance of government transparency and how the university handles request under the N.C. Public Records Law.

On October 28, the center joined with the First Amendment Law Review to present a symposium that brought together lawyers and scholars from across the country to discuss "The First Amendment Legacy of Justice Antonin Scalia." The symposium began with a keynote address by Judge Jeffrey S. Sutton of the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, who served as a law clerk to Justices Antonin Scalia and Lewis Powell. Then an esteemed group of panelists discussed Justice Scalia's legacy, including Professors Mary-Rose Papandrea and Ted Shaw from Carolina Law.

CE³ Awards Scholarship, Expands Leadership, Initiates Collaboration and Announces Inaugural Board

"Erin Brockovich," the 2000 biographical movie about the woman who crusaded for a safe public water supply in her California city, fueled Kristin Brunn 1L's interest in the environment.

Later, as an environmental science and policy major at Duke University, Brunn took an environmental law class taught by UNC School of Law professor Don Hornstein.

"I absolutely loved that class, and it further reinforced my plan to pursue environmental law," says Brunn.

She was awarded the first full-tuition academic law scholarship in the country for a student to study the intersection of environmental and energy law, one focus of the UNC School of Law Center for Climate, Energy, Environment and Economics (CE³).

A Duke Energy Foundation gift is funding the new scholarship and a range of projects aimed at expanding CE³'s mission. The scholarship is one of many innovative initiatives in progress.

CE³ director Victor Flatt, the Tom & Elizabeth Taft Distinguished Professor in Environmental Law, notes Brunn's "stellar academic history and commitment to studying environmental issues in a real-world setting."

A 2015 graduate, Brunn wrote policy briefs for Duke's Marine Lab and worked one summer on environmental projects in South Africa.

Meanwhile, in a new renewable-energy collaboration, CE³ and Carolina Law's Center for Banking and Finance held an April workshop on Law, Policy and the Future of Solar Financing, with the UNC School of Government's Center for Environmental Finance.

Participants from academia, government, the finance industry, nonprofits and the renewable energy field discussed future demand for solar energy, financing options for solar projects, and ways to increase private-sector funding of North Carolina solar projects through law or policy changes.

"There was general consensus that the role of Public Utilities Commissions in traditionally regulated states was important, and that there were possible ways to use community solar to help people at a small scale," he says.

"There was general consensus that the role of Public Utilities Commissions in traditionally regulated states was important, and that there were possible ways to use community solar to help people at a small scale."

This summer, CE³ welcomed Jonas Monast as CE³ co-director and new assistant professor and C. Boyden Gray Distinguished Fellow. Monast, former director of the Climate and Energy Program at Duke University's Nicholas Institute for Environmental Policy Solutions, joined CE³ in July as part of the center's renaming and expansion.

"I'm pleased to have Jonas on board as co-director of CE³," Flatt says. "We have an amazing opportunity to do even more than we have done in the past to educate and integrate students in the areas of climate, energy, environment, and economic development, and by doing that, contribute even more to the national and international conversation about these very important issues."

In October, CE³ announced the members of its inaugural board of advisors. The 22-member advisory board is comprised of former government officials, community partners, persons who work with energy and environmental businesses, and representatives from various UNC academic departments and centers. The standing student president of the UNC Environmental Law Project is also a member of the board.

The board of advisors will provide intellectual and organizational support to CE³ in the execution of its mission to provide advanced student education while also examining policy and legal issues surrounding the law of climate, energy, environment and economic development.

A Message From the Law Alumni Association

It is an exciting time in the life of our law school. While the challenges and opportunities before us are significant and the times call for the active engagement of all of our alumni, recent history bodes well for the future.

Dean Martin H. Brinkley '92 marked his first year as our dean on July 1 of this year, and what an extraordinary year it was. The wisdom of the Dean Search Committee and the Provost in recommending and selecting Dean Brinkley for this critical role has been proven time and time again.

He traveled extensively during his first year to meet with and listen to alumni across the nation. He immersed himself in assembling a world class staff and attracting and retaining talented faculty who will train and mold current and future classes of law students. He has also worked tirelessly to shore up support for the law school in the halls of state government and within the UNC system.

Because of large reductions in state support for the law school over the past several years, Dean Brinkley, in collaboration with the Law Alumni Association, has focused substantially on identifying and cultivating alternate sources of support for student scholarships and programming requirements. Carolina Law's ability to continue to fulfill its mission as a truly public institution, dedicated to training and producing talented attorneys and leaders, is dependent upon materially increasing our private fundraising.

For the first time in Carolina Law's history, the 2016 fiscal year Carolina Law Annual Fund campaign exceeded $1 million!

That achievement, which was critical foundational work for more lofty goals we must hit during the current and future fiscal years, is attributable to Dean Brinkley's leadership, vision, active participation and encouragement, combined with the inspiring dedication and efforts of our Office of Advancement staff and many alumni, including the 2,161 alumni who made a financial gift.

I had the privilege of welcoming our current 1L class during their orientation in August. The quality of our entire student body, measured against a variety of criteria, including life and work experiences, racial and ethnic diversity, and academic scores and rankings, remains extremely high. That we have been able to maintain an exemplary group of students during a period of precipitous declines in the number of LSAT takers and law school applicants nationwide is a testament to the reputation of Carolina Law and the tenacity, resourcefulness and commitment of our faculty and staff.

As we look to the future, there is much about which we can and should be excited. But formidable obstacles also confront us. We must continue to prudently and aggressively confront and address the challenges and capitalize on the opportunities presented by our current circumstances.

After 30 years, I am prouder than ever to be a UNC School of Law alumnus, and I am eager to continue to work with all of you and with our remarkable dean, faculty, staff and student body to assure the success of our school.

Jane Perkins '81 Receives the 2016 Kutak-Dodds Prize from the National Legal Aid & Defender Association

On September 29 in Washington, D.C, the National Legal Aid & Defender Association (NLADA) presented the Kutak-Dodds Prize to National Health Law (NHeLP) Legal Director Jane Perkins '81.

Established in 1989, the Kutak-Dodds award is jointly sponsored by NLADA and the Robert J Kutak Foundation and includes a $10,000 cash prize. The Kutak-Dodds Prize honors an "equal justice advocate who, through the practice of law, has contributed in a significant way to the enhancement of the human dignity and quality of life of those persons unable to afford legal representation."

NLADA is the nation's oldest nonprofit group dedicated to providing legal services to those who cannot afford counsel.

According to NLADA, Perkins was chosen, in part, "for engaging in litigation and advocacy on behalf of low-income people with disabilities, and children in all 50 states."

Perkins has served as counsel in more than 30 high-profile lawsuits across the county to protect and advance the health rights of low-income and underserved individuals. She is also a senior attorney with the Network for Public Health Law-Southeastern Region. Perkins has taught health law and policy at Carolina Law and served as a clinical associate professor in health policy at the UNC School of Social Work.

Raina Haque '12 Conducts Social Experiment Involving a Patent Application and the Collaboration of Two Law Students with Different Backgrounds

Take two students at different law schools with different academic backgrounds and work experience who have never met. Give them dense legal and technical material for a project to do together. Remotely. With no hand-holding guidance.

What happens?

In the case of Ali Portaro and Mark Clare, the results were a well-done draft patent application and patentability opinion letter advising an engineer on the likelihood he could patent his invention.

Raina Haque '12, who owns Erdős Intellectual Property Law + Startup Legal in Winston-Salem, N.C., initiated the project, which she calls a social experiment, over the summer in her work for an engineer client who was open to the idea of the social and intellectual venture.

She hired UNC School of Law's Portaro 3L and Clare 3L, who attends Wake Forest University School of Law.

Ali Portaro 3L

"My goals were to learn from Ali's and Mark's perspectives, empower them to think about running their own firms one day, show them how fun it is to be an IP attorney, and have a great work product for the invention and my client," Haque says.

She was impressed not only by the work they produced but by how well they collaborated.

Haque wanted students with disparate backgrounds. Before law school, Portaro, with a bachelor's degree in art history and Spanish, was a translator for an art center and worked in fashion design during summers while in college. Clare, with a bachelor's in mechanical engineering, had traveled around the world for projects laying fiber optic cables on ocean floors.

"What they have in common is that they're both whip-smart and came highly recommended. They are disciplined, dedicated and adventurous," Haque says. "And they are attorneys who will be minted in this age — which means they can figure a lot of things out and excel if you give them trust and move out of the way."

And that's just what Haque did.

With their left-brain/right-brain approach, Clare and Portaro — who hadn't even taken a patent law class — collaborated for two weeks on the project, which was related to the commercially successful Hogball, a mechanical device used by boar hunters.

"I had a pretty big learning curve at the beginning, learning about patentability and deciphering some of the technical language describing the invention," Portaro says.

Raina Haque '12 was recognized at the third annual "Winston < 40 Leadership Awards" held October 6. The awards recognize individuals excelling in their respective fields who are actively influencing the growth, prosperity and quality of life in Winston-Salem and Forsyth County.

In the end, they identified how the client could modify features of the device to potentially increase patentability and sales.

"Ali and Mark did a deep dive into manufacturing processes, the behavioral psychology and physiology of [hoofed] animals and competitor pests, long-felt and unmet need in the related industry, and assessing environmental concerns and impact," Haque says.

Ultimately, the pair knocked it out of the park, she noted.

"The project was definitely a confidence-builder in learning that I had beneficial ideas to offer to something that was initially completely foreign to me," Portaro says. "The most rewarding part was experiencing how the technical and creative come together and are related. Mark and I came at the project in different ways, but neither of us had any problem seeing the value of our different ideas. It was rewarding to see our ideas come together in a way that benefited the client."

Kearns Davis '95 Sworn in as N.C. Bar Association President, Alumni Honored at Annual Meeting

Carolina Law alumni were recognized at the 118th North Carolina Bar Association Annual Meeting, which was held in Charlotte, N.C., in June.

On June 25, Kearns Davis '95, a partner with Brooks, Pierce, McLendon, Humphrey & Leonard LLP, was installed as the 122nd president of the NCBA. Previously, Davis served as the chair of the NCBA's Young Lawyers Division from 2004-05 and was honored as the first recipient of the organization's Robinson O. Everett Professionalism Award in 2010. He chaired the NCBA's

"The North Carolina Bar Association's mission is to pursue liberty and justice for the people of North Carolina," says Davis. "I'm humbled by the privilege of working with lawyers and judges across the state to strengthen and support our legal system."

Thomas W. Ross '75 received the Judge John J. Parker Award, the highest award bestowed by the NCBA.

Willis P. Whichard '65 received the H. Brent McKnight Renaissance Lawyer Award.

Rachel Blunk '11 received the Younger Lawyer Pro Bono Award.

Charles Palmer Brown '66 and Ralph "Bo" McDonald '64 were inducted into the N.C. General Practice Hall of Fame, which recognizes exemplary service and high ethical and professional standards as a general legal practitioner in North Carolina.

The Clifton B. Knight Jr. '74 Scholarship—Committed to Students and the Direction Carolina Law is Heading

Enjoying a successful career in New York City in media, the arts and entertainment, Clifton Brooks "Clif" Knight Jr. has not forgotten his North Carolina roots. Knight—who serves as executive vice president for legal and business affairs and chief ethics and compliance officer at Bookspan LLC—grew up in Raleigh and earned his law degree from UNC School of Law in 1974 after receiving bachelor's degrees in economics and sociology from North Carolina State University. Knight also holds an M.B.A. from New York University.

In appreciation of the importance of Carolina Law to his career, Knight recently made a transformational bequest to the school. The Clifton B. Knight Jr. Scholarship will be an annual endowed merit-based scholarship, established in recognition of Knight's commitment to the students of Carolina Law and his belief in the unique character and place that the school holds at the university and within the state of North Carolina and beyond.

"Most importantly, this is a seminal moment for Carolina Law with the arrival of Martin Brinkley as dean last year," says Knight. "His understanding and appreciation of North Carolina history, the greater university system, and Carolina Law is quite unique. Given his sense of history and strategic vision, Dean Brinkley has the ability to place Carolina Law squarely in the top tier of national public law schools. There are clearly challenges ahead of us including funding, facilities, and more, but given this backdrop and the potential, I'm sure of success and I'm happy to commit and work with Carolina Law however I can as an alumnus."

An active alumnus of the law school, Knight says that it has been a privilege to have hosted Carolina Law students as part of a summer associate program at his company. The company is one of the largest direct-to-consumer distributors of media products in the United States and operates iconic book clubs, including Doubleday, Literary Guild and Book of the Month.

"I have found it tremendously gratifying to work with students who are smart, curious and eager to learn, and especially to see them progress and succeed," he says. "Folks were very generous to me as I was coming along. And, I'm certain that in time, those I've sponsored will likewise engage and shepherd those who come along behind them."

"Having had the pleasure of working closely with a number of Carolina Law students in our summer associate program for over a decade, I'm very excited about the prospect of creating opportunities in the future for others through the Knight Scholarship program," says Knight. "I'm pleased to work with Carolina Law in a creative way to set up a program that I hope will be significant."

Knight says that the objective of the scholarship will be to enable students who might be under the radar.

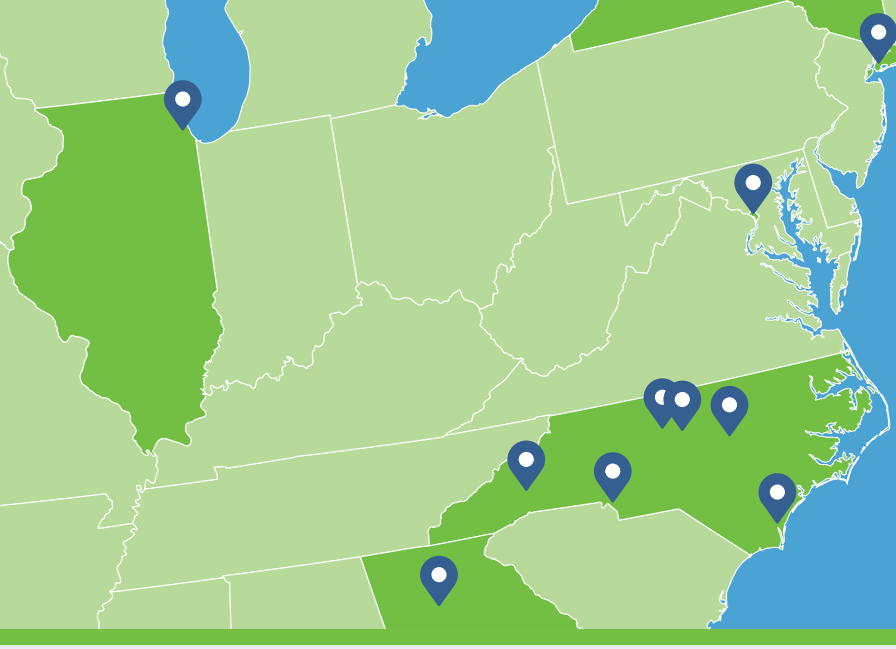

"The key element will be to cast a wider net than might be the norm to identify very special students who have tremendous potential, and who are highly deserving, but might otherwise be overlooked," he says. "The scholarship will be merit-based and will involve a multitude of criteria including academic excellence, strength of character, service, leadership -- and extra dimensions including creativity, entrepreneurship, and possessing of worthwhile aspirational goals."

Similarly loyal to his undergraduate alma mater, Knight and his wife last year established a "planned giving" bequest to The Poole College of Management at North Carolina State University to establish the Clifton Brooks Knight Jr. and Raya Keis Knight Scholarship Fund.

"I'm really pleased now to commit here given the clear path of ascendancy of Carolina Law as a prestigious public national law school," says Knight. "I know this will be a hugely good investment. So, I would encourage all Carolina Law graduates to think seriously about stepping up to support the school. It's exciting to be involved given Dean Brinkley's lofty endeavors to move Carolina Law forward and it's immensely gratifying to see and feel the momentum."

Carolina Law Establishes 10 New Regional Alumni Clubs

Asheville, Atlanta, Charlotte, Chicago, Greensboro, New York, Raleigh, Washington, D.C., Wilmington, & Winston-Salem

Jimmy Moore '04 has found a rewarding way to bridge the distance between Chapel Hill, where he attended law school, and New York, where he has practiced law since he graduated.

He is among a large and growing number of graduates active in alumni groups, called Carolina Law Clubs, around the country.

"In a city as large and cosmopolitan as New York, our local Carolina Law Club allows alumni to deepen ties with classmates and access a network of diverse, talented professionals with whom they will have an instant bond," says Moore, a volunteer club representative who helps run the group.

"What has been most meaningful to me has been the opportunity to connect across classes by gaining new mentors, strengthening friendships with classmates, and advising recent graduates," Moore says.

Numerous clubs have formed recently in an initiative of the Alumni Engagement Committee. Some are large — about 3,000 members in the Triangle group — while others are much smaller, including the Kentucky club, which has about 25 members. There are now more than 20 Carolina Law Clubs throughout the U.S.

"The beauty of this program's structure is that any alum, anywhere in the world where there are two or more alumni, who wants to be involved can be, and they collectively are providing a service we would be unable to do without their support," Susan McLean, director of alumni and donor relations, says.

Three more North Carolina clubs are expected to be established soon. The clubs will cover Eastern North Carolina (Greenville, Rocky Mount, Wilson, New Bern, and the Crystal Coast), the Sandhills region (Fayetteville and surrounding areas) and the Catawba Valley region (Hickory and surrounding areas.)

"The law school is certainly stronger when alumni are engaged, and we hope that giving alumni opportunities to connect with their fellow alums and their school will lead to more fulfilling careers," Alumni Engagement Committee chair Brian Meacham '03 says.

"It is a two-way street. We want alumni to support the law school, and we want the law school to continue providing valuable opportunities to its alumni after graduation. The clubs provide one vehicle for accomplishing these goals by bringing the law school closer to alumni," Meacham says.

Club representatives are active in various ways, including assisting alumni moving to their area, developing programming for their group and helping the law school organize alumni events.

"It's important to stay connected for professional networking and socialization purposes, but also to keep current on what's happening at the law school. The most valuable thing for me is the sense of community," says New York club representative Rose Cordero Prey '04. "I enjoy getting to know fellow Tar Heels and bonding over our shared experiences. Maintaining these relationships among alumni only strengthens support for the law school."

In addition to other activities, the New York club sponsors an annual welcome event for summer associates interviewing in New York City, meets when faculty are in town for speaking engagements and watches sporting events together.

Greg Boyd '04 is a club representative and, with Moore and Prey, a founding member of the New York club.

"I do it to stay connected to the school and help young alumni get adjusted to New York City," Boyd says, "especially people from North Carolina who, like me, come to New York with no family or social network."

Tar Heel Lawyers Committed to Elevating Carolina Law

UNC School of Law alumni helped the school make history this summer by raising more than $1 million for the Carolina Law Annual Fund. This was the first time the fund has reached the million-dollar milestone. Committed to maintaining academic excellence and providing scholarship aid to outstanding law students, Dean Martin H. Brinkley '92 made the annual fund a key priority and issued a call to action for the UNC Law Alumni Association.

"We simply can't continue to rely on tuition revenue and public support as we have in the past," says Brinkley. "We must increase the success of our annual fund through private donations so that we can attract and retain the nation's most promising students and outstanding faculty."

"The annual fund provides flexibility to meet the needs that are the greatest priority for the law school," says Dana Dubis, director of annual giving.

Private funds are needed since state appropriations account for approximately 44 percent of the operating budget, down from 70 percent in earlier years. In 2009, a significant cut was made in public funding to the UNC system, resulting in Carolina Law losing one-third of its state support. Tuition—which is currently $23,500 for in-state students and just over $40,000 for out-of-state students—has increased 78 percent since 2009.

"The school gave us our careers and we, the alumni, need to support it."

"The mission of the law school is to be truly great and truly public," says Dubis. "We want North Carolinians who have the will and the brains to be at Carolina Law to have the ability to attend. We don't want to limit people to career choices because of debt; if you graduate with $80,000 in debt, it's hard to work in a firm in a small town in North Carolina or go into the public sector. At the same time, we want to hire and retain strong faculty. All of these things need flexible funding sources."

Rick Magee '83, a consultant who retired as general counsel for EnPro Industries, is one of the alumni who helped with the fundraising effort. "When I reached out to fellow alumni, I realized that, just like me, people were largely unaware that financial support from the state had dropped significantly," says Magee. "When I attended Carolina, it was truly a public institution that was well-funded by the state so there wasn't a need to raise significant funds, but that's not true now."

Magee, whose son Jack graduated from Carolina Law in 2012, is pleased to have recently reconnected with the school. "Now more than ever, with the heightened need—especially for scholarship money to attract talented law students—it's really important for folks to understand that the funds just aren't there unless the support comes from alumni."

Robert Zaytoun '75 agrees.

"In a way, alumni are all individual trustees who need to act as in-the-field fiduciaries to make sure that we preserve UNC Law School's proud history and traditions," says Zaytoun, a principal in Zaytoun Law Firm in Raleigh. Zaytoun, who has chaired the school's scholarships golf tournament for the past three years, says, "We all get very busy in our law practices and can forget at times from whence our career came. The older I get, the more I realize we have to give back so that others can share the same benefits we were afforded through our legal education. Helping through giving and encouraging others to give brings me full circle with my roots at UNC Law."

Also grateful to Carolina Law is Alice Richey '86.

"All of us who went to Chapel Hill for law school got a great deal financially," says Richey, who practices business litigation with Charlotte's Alexander Ricks PLLC. "The school gave us our careers and we, the alumni, need to support it."

Richey says that it behooves alumni to support the school. "Strong funding helps the school maintain its ranking which benefits current and future, but also former students," she says. "If Carolina becomes a school that is not considered a great law school, that reflects on my degree, even though at the time I went it was considered a great law school."

"Strong funding helps the school maintain its ranking which benefits current and future, but also former students."

Jim Kerr '92, executive vice president and general counsel of Southern Company, was a law school classmate of Brinkley.

"I've supported the law school since graduating but my interest has been renewed by the hiring of my classmate as the dean, something the school has benefited from," he says.

Richard Farley '87, Walter Fisher '86, Jay Goffman '83, Craig Lynch '86, Charles Plambeck '86, Scott Vaughn '86, Joni Walser '86 and Bonnie Weyher '77 are among the many members of the Carolina Law alumni family who came together in the final stretch to help the school surpass its goal in addition to Magee, Zaytoun, Richey and Kerr.

"Achieving a one-million-dollar annual fund is a reflection of efforts by the alumni and the staff. It demonstrates the high regard in which we alumni hold the law school," says Richey. "I hope that number becomes our benchmark rather than our top and that we continuously exceed it going forward."

The goal for the annual fund for 2016-17 is $1.2 million.

The Intersection of Sports & Law

By Nancy E. Oates

For a field that some say doesn't exist — sports law — Carolina Law prepares its students well.

Carolina Law opens doors for students to build a career in sports law through externships in UNC's Athletics Department, a joint degree program with Exercise and Sports Science (EXSS), opportunities to get involved in many aspects of the world class intercollegiate athletics activities on campus and access to helpful resources, including an EXSS professor who holds a joint appointment with the law school.

Lissa Broome

Lissa Broome, a law professor and UNC's Faculty Athletics Representative to the National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA) and this year's president of the Atlantic Coast Conference (ACC), says the foundation for success in the field comes from the legal training that teaches students to think critically, be ethical in the approach to situations, use good judgment and provide wise counsel to their clients. "That skill set is invaluable in this fast-paced, high-stakes world that athletics has become," Broome says.

Athletics needs lawyers at any number of intersections, including antitrust, enforcement, compliance and contract law.

ANTITRUST: The NCAA and some conferences have been defendants in lawsuits brought by student-athletes, and those antitrust issues need to be sorted out. In October, the Supreme Court declined to hear the O'Bannon case that found an antitrust violation in capping the amount of a student-athlete's scholarship. The Jenkins case raises the issue of the continuing legitimacy of an amateur model for college sports.

ENFORCEMENT: How does the NCAA enforce its rules? The NCAA has a large enforcement staff made up of many law school graduates, and universities need their own lawyers to defend against allegations. UNC's Office of University Counsel represents the University with help on some occasions from attorneys from outside law firms.

COMPLIANCE: An employee within the athletics department of every school monitors the actions of the department, student-athletes and coaches to ensure that they are complying with NCAA rules. In many cases that person is trained as a lawyer. Attorneys also often work in athletics to make sure that the school is appropriately managing all risks associated with athletics.

CONTRACTS: At the conference level, large, complex TV contracts must be negotiated, such as the ACC's recent contract with ESPN. At the school level, lawyers need to negotiate personnel contracts for athletics directors and coaches; apparel contracts, such as UNC's agreement for Nike providing apparel and equipment to sports programs, and other ancillary media rights.

"At Carolina Law, we're training critical thinkers and people who can absorb a lot of information, make sense of it, figure out what's missing and what more needs to be collected," Broome says. "Those competencies can be put to use in sports law and any other field."

Meet some Carolina Law alumni who have made prominent careers in sports law.

Charlie Henn '98

What does Carolina blue mean to you? And to whether you'll spend money on a shirt in Carolina blue as opposed to another color? Does the shirt have anything else on it that telegraphs your interest in UNC that influenced your decision to buy, even if it doesn't have the well-known interlocking logo on it? If so, is Carolina entitled to a portion of the profit the manufacturer makes on the sale of a shirt that might have been motivated by your fondness for the school?

Charlie Henn, an intellectual property and trademark attorney with Kilpatrick Townsend & Stockton in Atlanta, considers these questions carefully, argues them thoroughly in court, and wins decisions for his clients.

"Organizations hire me when they are aware of someone infringing their rights," Henn says. "I file a lawsuit and litigate it all the way through trial and sometimes all the way to the appellate courts."

That's part of what makes Henn's work fun and interesting.

"I get to spend time meeting with and learning from non-lawyers about very practical things that we all encounter with brands and trademarks every day, but we don't consciously think about," he says.

Henn has litigated a number of cases for college and university athletic departments, enforcing their rights to their team colors, mascots and logos. He has done similar work for all of the professional sports leagues — the NFL, MLB, NHL and NBA. He has handled quite a few matters for Adidas, one of the largest athletics apparel providers in the U.S., involving its three-stripe trademark.

Trademark work often falls into one of two categories: two large companies disagreeing on which has the right to profit from a color combination, logo or other branding — he won the largest trademark award ever, $305 million for Adidas against Payless Shoes; and instances where the infringers are not known.

Recently, Henn sought relief for the Chicago Cubs from vendors selling counterfeit products outside Wrigley Field. The court allowed the Cubs to seize and impound the unauthorized product to prevent those vendors from getting rid of it.

Bringing suit against individuals making unauthorized sales online can be problematic.

"In the world of Internet sales, it's sometimes hard to track down who's doing the bad conduct," he says. "You used to be able to go to a store and find the owner. Now you never know who's behind the sale and where the product is made and how it's getting into the country."

Before deciding between UNC's offer of a full-ride chancellor's scholarship and well-known private law school that offered no financial assistance, Henn sought the advice of a junior partner in a law firm in his native Atlanta. Henn told the partner he wanted to be a trial lawyer, and the partner advised him to go to Carolina. By the time Henn completed his JD, the partner had become the hiring partner at Kilpatrick Townsend. Now Henn holds that position.

Henn credits Carolina Law for putting him on the path to success, if for no other reason than Carolina helped him secure a summer internship at Kilpatrick Townsend after his first year in law school. There, he was assigned to work on a matter for Adidas, and he returned to that when he was hired by the firm after graduation. He built his career from there.

"I was a lucky junior associate," he says.

Pat Hobbs '85

In transitioning from a law school dean to the athletics director of a Division I school, Pat Hobbs says that the biggest difficulty is that "your decisions get scrutinized almost immediately by the media." He certainly faced complex issues and made decisions that had far-reaching effects as dean of Seton Hall University School of Law, but no online publication posted six to eight articles every day on situations he contended with, as nj.com does on topics under his purview now that he is athletics director for Rutgers University.

And he has only been on the job for less than a year.

"Media scrutiny can be good in terms of marketing your program, but it can be challenging if you have things you're trying to address and correct," Hobbs says. "The challenge [of being athletics director] is greater than I thought. The opportunity is greater as well."

Hobbs, a New Jersey native, came to Carolina because "it was the highest quality, most affordable legal degree opportunity I could get," he says. He intended to study criminal defense law, but a course on taxation taught by Professor Patricia Bryan changed his mind. He told her he wanted to teach, and she mentored him, advising him to practice for a few years and get his LL.M. By 1990, he was on the faculty of Seton Hall's law school.

He had always had an interest in sports, though the only college play he had was a pickup game with Michael Jordan in which he does not recall ever touching the ball. Even so, in 1998, when Hobbs was associate dean of the law school, Seton Hall's president sought his counsel on rectifying problems with the school's basketball team. The school made a coaching change and hired a new athletics director. Hobbs added to his responsibilities helping redevelop the men's basketball program.

The following year, the school promoted Hobbs to dean of the law school. In 2004, when Newark, N.J., was considering whether to build a new hockey and basketball arena downtown, Hobbs chaired the Mayor's Blue Ribbon Commission on Downtown Redevelopment that ultimately led to the development of the Prudential Center, where the New Jersey Devils, Seton Hall and the New Jersey Nets played. That led to his service on the Devils' board for a term.

When Seton Hall's men's basketball program faltered again in 2009, Hobbs stepped in as acting athletics director and revamped the athletics department.

While on sabbatical in 2015, after stepping down from the deanship, he got a call from Rutgers and within days was hired as its new athletics director. His first task was to hire a new football coach. Having a winning team matters because it drives revenue from ticket sales, sponsorship and donations. And that revenue funds non-revenue Olympic sports and scholarships. The bottom line benefits students, and interacting with students is Hobbs' favorite part of the job.

"They bring athletic talent to the university, which has provided them with scholarships," he says. "They're very disciplined and committed, and they work hard. They know the vast majority of them will never go on to pro sports, so they're here to get an education."

Fundraising takes up a big part of Hobbs' time. Right now he's in the middle of a $100 million campaign. He engages legislators and the governor, officials whose policies have a big impact on every university.

"There's always competition for dollars and not enough resources," he says.

Hobbs puts his law degree to use every day on the many contracts he must negotiate and review: contracts for coaches, games and apparel, as well as policies and regulations, including Title IX compliance.

"The only thing I don't spend time on is taxes, which is my training," he says.

Ben Solomon

Jim Delany '73

The Big 10 Conference distributes about a quarter billion dollars of financial aid to student-athletes every year. About 11 million fans come to Big 10 athletic competitions annually, and the conference produces some 1,400 telecasts each year through its TV network. Big 10 Commissioner Jim Delany knows better than anyone else: it all costs money.

"We need to be able to afford to do all the things we're doing," Delany says.

Delany was recruited to the Big 10 in 1989 after a decade as commissioner of the Ohio Valley Conference and four years with the NCAA Enforcement Division before that. He lettered in basketball at Carolina as an undergrad. Immersed in college sports for nearly half a century, he has ridden its growth trajectory and been in charge of handling the increasingly litigious environment. He does not practice law directly but has a number of lawyers who work for him to take on issues that range from antitrust law and labor law to Title IX concerns and basic transactions.

In the past 10 years, in particular, he has seen legal matters mushroom, from government and media affairs to the expanding complexity of technology.

"In all aspects of society, there has been a profound change in how the public watches our events," he says.

The Big 10 created the first conference TV network, and along with that comes all manner of social and digital applications. In addition, the Big 10 has licensing arrangements with CBS, ESPN and Fox. The conference also live-streams hundreds of events and stays current with social media.

"As the sports field changed and evolved, I had the enthusiasm and capacity to learn it and make a contribution to it," he says.

Delany grew up in a family that valued education. His dad and sisters are teachers, and his father also coached. Delany and his siblings were taught to use both sports and education as ways to advance themselves. After he completed his undergraduate degree, he had the opportunity to play basketball professionally in Europe. He turned it down in favor of law school.

"I was able to take areas I was passionate about — education and athletics — and build a career."

Law school taught him to analyze problems, parse options and form judgments, he says. Many transactions come across his desk in his work as commissioner, several dealing with technology and public affairs. Through his law degree, he also learned the language of law and a way of thinking and talking. He had many good professors who mentored him.

"They weren't talking sports law, though," he says. "They were talking contracts, property and constitutional law. I didn't necessarily think how they might or might not be applicable to my future career."

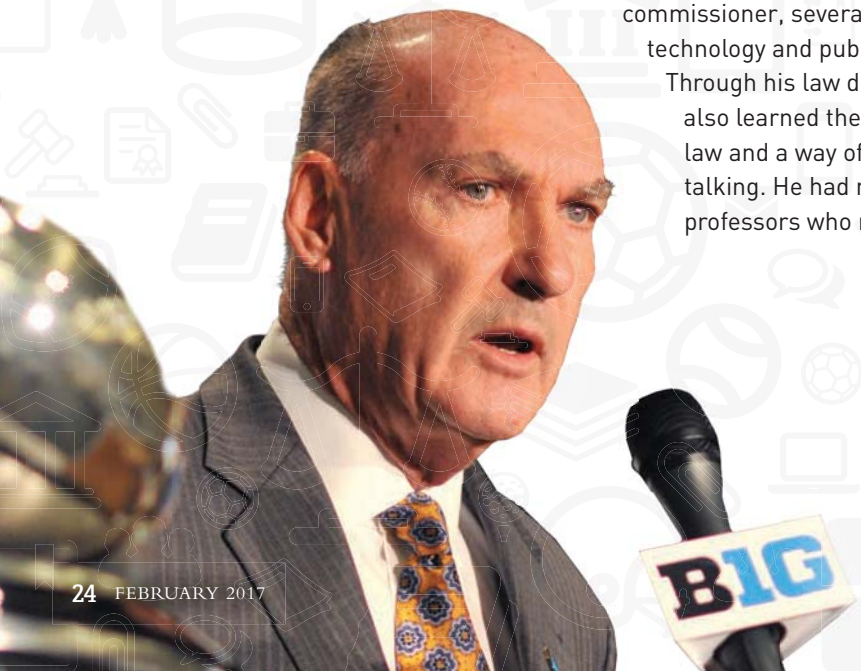

As commissioner, he makes decisions about how to manage litigation and the public affairs that goes along with those lawsuits, not to mention the legal fees. He also wrestles with issues such as the time demands on student-athletes, academic standards for eligibility and Title IX compliance. He must be ever vigilant about following federal laws and NCAA regulations, because noncompliance has a high price tag.

"Our schools are the recipients of $11 billion in federal research dollars," he says. "Sports knows they have to comply with all the relevant federal laws because a huge amount of money is at stake."

When Delany was a student-athlete, college was regional — most students lived within a couple hundred miles of home — it was male, and it was white. Today, it's global and diverse. Some 115 Big 10 student-athletes competed in the Summer Olympics in Rio last August, representing more than 20 countries.

The number of young people in college sports totals close to half a million. Other than the military, no organization comes close to providing the opportunities that the NCAA does.

"This doesn't exist in Africa or Asia or Europe," Delany says. "It's unique to America and does a lot of social good. It's not about the '1 percent.' It's a broad range of opportunities for a lot of people."

Edgar Burch '02

Edgar Burch, a lobbyist for the NCAA, says members of Congress and their staff are no different from any other sports fans. "They just have a much louder voice when addressing concerns within college athletics," he says.

"They are in a position to ask questions and recommend changes to policy that could greatly impact the experience of the more than 40,000 student-athletes competing in college athletics each year."

Burch's career-long tenure with the NCAA began shortly after graduating from Carolina Law. The Congressional Black Caucus Foundation in Washington, D.C., told him about a fellowship at the NCAA. Despite having very limited exposure to the world of political lobbying, he was hired for the temporary position, which became permanent within the year, and he has been there ever since. Having mastered a steep learning curve, he now thrives among the competitive and well-educated policymakers in the nation's capital.

Relationship-building is key to his work educating members of Congress, correcting misinformation and helping them see a broader perspective of college sports than only the major revenue generators. One incident at one school may impel elected officials to think that the problem is systemic and begin crafting legislation to control it. He sits in on congressional hearings to learn of concerns and generates numerous reports to NCAA members and the 500 staff members at the NCAA office in Indianapolis.

"A large percentage of what we do is play defense," Burch says. "We try to prevent external third parties from negatively influencing the direction of college athletics."

Those third parties may latch onto a range of issues, including sports wagering, redistributing revenue and regulating health and safety concerns such as concussions and compensating student athletes. He tells Congress what the NCAA is doing already to positively impact the experience student-athletes have, both on and off the competition field. For instance, he has spent a significant amount of time lately educating members of Congress and staff on the $30 million longitudinal study the NCAA and the Department of Defense have collaborated on to learn the impact of repeated concussions and how to properly address brain injuries.

Burch also oversees the NCAA's internship program. He has noticed that the candidate pool is more focused than in years past. Some come to him with three or four internships with recognizable organizations and teams, something that admittedly is difficult to accomplish by law students who have only two summers to collect a range of experiences. He encourages students to take advantage of any and all opportunities they come across.

"If there's an NCAA championship coming to your area or a pro team is running a training camp near you, go volunteer," he says. "If you know people on campus or in the community or alumni working in the sports field, conduct information interviews with them. You have to be more than a huge sports fan to succeed."

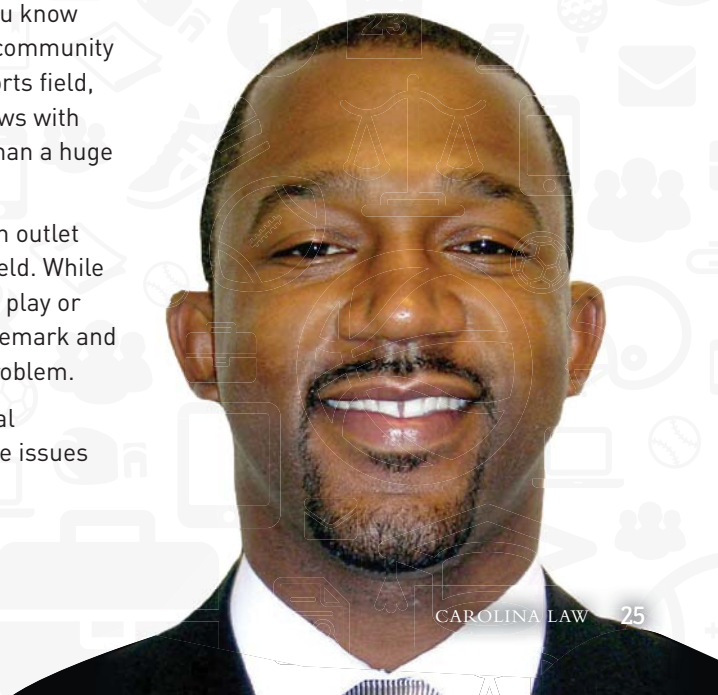

Sports has become less of an outlet the longer he works in the field. While watching a game, he'll see a play or hear an announcer make a remark and think: That's going to be a problem.

"Watching sports is never total enjoyment," he says. "But the issues I work on I'd follow in my free time anyway. It's great that I can work on issues I have a strong interest in."

To know what Burch does on any given day, tune into sports talk radio or pick up a copy of USA Today. "Those issues on the front page are what I'll work on that day," he says. "Looking at Twitter or catching ESPN before I run out the door to work can ruin my morning."

Carolina Law now has a joint degree program with Sports Management, something he wished had been available when he was in law school. The school still has the supportive faculty he benefited from while he was a student, away from home for the first time (he completed his undergraduate degree at the University of Michigan in the town where he grew up) and with no one to say hello to when he walked across campus those first few days. He left Carolina with the skills and confidence to succeed in a demanding career.

"Not only did I receive a quality education but it was an environment where I felt nurtured," he says. "I met my wife there, so if for no other reason, Carolina was a great choice."

Richard Thigpen Sr. '56

As athletes know, positioning matters. Putting yourself in the right place at the right time increases your chance of success. Richard Thigpen, who retired in 1998 as general counsel of the Carolina Panthers, built a career in sports law doing just that.

A tax lawyer known for his negotiating skills, Thigpen signed with a private law practice in Charlotte in 1958. As a new member of the Charlotte Chamber of Commerce and a diehard sports fan, he joined the chamber's sports committee. He chaired the committee of the chamber and city to study the renovation and expansion of Charlotte's coliseum in the 1960s, and a decade later was tapped to study the feasibility of a pro football stadium in Charlotte, and then a sports, entertainment and performing arts facility. In the interim, he represented several NBA players in contract negotiations.

And just like that, Thigpen found himself practicing in the little-known field of sports law.

"When I was representing an NBA player in the early '70s, I went to a meeting of sports agents in Las Vegas," Thigpen says. "There weren't but about a dozen of us. Now if you go to a Sports Lawyers Association Conference, there will be 600 to 800 lawyers there who practice law related to some aspect of sports."

Over the course of his career, Thigpen took on clients in various sports ventures: the future owner of an NBA franchise in Charlotte; the owners of the American Soccer League franchise; the minor league ice hockey team of the Charlotte Checkers; the Southern Hockey League; the World Football League; and the Charlotte Hornets.

He began representing future owners of the Carolina Panthers in 1987, and when the franchise came through in 1993, he agreed to serve as general counsel. In that role, he oversaw the handling of innumerable legal issues: workers comp, brownfields litigation, sign ordinances, sponsorship deals, interest swaps, personnel problems, construction contracts, securities matters, and the county health department deeming the resistance pools as open to the public.

"You'll encounter everything you can imagine about in the practice of law if you're dealing with sports ventures, athletes and fans," he says.

Law school taught Thigpen how to recognize a problem, research to find an answer, then express himself well as he presented his conclusions verbally and in writing.

"If you don't recognize problems," he says, "you're going to get hurt."

Thigpen earned the respect of his peers, who elected him president of the statewide N.C. Bar Association, the national American College of Tax Counsel and the international Sports Law Association. He also made time to serve as president of the N.C. Sports Hall of Fame and chair of the World Seniors Invitational Golf Tournament and the 2000 USGA Senior Amateur Championship.

When Thigpen told the Panthers of his plans to retire, the franchise recruited his son, who had been working on Panther business for more than a decade. The hire came so quickly, Thigpen says, "I didn't have a chance to give him any advice."

The heads of the NFL, NBA and NHL all are lawyers who came out of private practice. Thigpen's advice to law students who want to break into sports law: Join a firm that represents athletes or teams and gravitate toward those clients.

"Put yourself in a position where you get exposed to sports clients, then do the best job you can," he says.

His winning career started at Carolina Law, he says, where he learned how to recognize and handle problems. "Even if I had never practiced law a day in my life, what I learned in law school was the best education I could have had," he says. "It would stand me in good stead in anything I did."

CAROLINA LAW CONNECTIONS . . . WHAT CAN YOU DO TO STAY CONNECTED?

Carolina Law needs more than just financial support to sustain its mission. The school needs alumni to find ways that are meaningful to them to stay connected with the school to ensure that Carolina Law continues to thrive for years to come. The school has many opportunities for alumni to reinvest in the value of a Carolina Law legal education by giving back and helping the next generation of Tar Heel lawyers.

Best Lawyers

Best Lawyers is the oldest and most highly-respected peer review guide to the legal profession worldwide. Inclusion in Best Lawyers is based entirely on peer-review. The methodology is designed to capture, as accurately as possible, the consensus opinion of leading lawyers about the professional abilities of their colleagues within the same geographical area and legal practice area. Best Lawyers employs a sophisticated, conscientious, rational, and transparent survey process designed to elicit meaningful and substantive evaluations of the quality of legal services. Our alumni below are identified as "best lawyers" in their areas of practice.

Legal Elite

Business North Carolina magazine honors Tar Heel lawyers by publishing Business North Carolina's "Legal Elite," a listing of the state's top lawyers in business-related categories. Each year, the magazine sends ballot notices to every member of the North State Bar living in North Carolina — asking the question: Of the Tar Heel lawyers whose work you have observed firsthand, whom would you rate among the current best in these categories? Our alumni listed below are identified as "legal elite" in their areas of practice.
