Based largely on primary sources in the Russian language, this succinct volume covers the following aspects of Soviet foreign policy: world outlook, personalities and structures of the decisionmaking process, implementation of objectives, and a discussion of practices toward geographic regions as well as specific countries.

The author illustrates how messianic dogma still guides USSR foreign policy, as the Kremlin attempts to spread its ideology throughout the world. He identifies four of the most useful instruments employed by the Soviet Union: propaganda, espionage/active measures, military power, and foreign trade.

The volume next treats foreign policy objectives and concludes that they are not always uniform: in Eastern Europe, the Soviets work to maintain or improve an imperialist position; in Western Europe, to effect the withdrawal of U.S. troops, then to subvert NATO and the EEC, and finally to achieve a fundamental realignment of political forces.

Relations with the Third World are adapted to each country's progress along the "revolutionary-democratic path." Those with the United States, however, are controlled by the Soviet view of America as the "main enemy" and the greatest remaining obstacle to the final USSR objective: a world of Marxist-Leninist states.
