ATP 3-90.97 Mountain Warfare and Cold Weather Operations is The Official Illustrated U.S. Army field Guide.

Chapter 1 addresses the severe environmental conditions associated with the mountain and cold region environments and their effect on units and individuals and discusses mountain and cold region terrain and weather characteristics that impact military operations.

Chapter 2 discusses specific effects of mountainous environments on intelligence operations by concentrating on two areas of the intelligence process; plan and direct, and collect. These activities are most impacted by mountainous environments, such as when the environment limits communication.

Chapter 3 addresses operations in mountains and their characteristics. Considerations for the size of units, formations, and detailed planning are addressed. Additionally, risk management considerations are introduced.

Chapter 4 focuses on how complex and compartmentalized terrain, the time of year, weather conditions, and an adversary's actions influence movement and maneuver in the mountains.

Chapter 5 looks at considerations for conducting engineering operations in mountain and cold region environments. Specific challenges for engineers in this environment and planning considerations to cope with them are discussed.

Chapter 6 covers a broad spectrum of planning considerations for sustainment in support of operations conducted in mountains and cold regions.

Chapter 7 covers the functions of military aviation in support of mountain operations. The unique considerations and limitations associated with military aviation in mountain operations, and how to minimize their effects, are addressed.

Chapter 8 addresses considerations for indirect fires in mountain operations. While the basic tactical principles for artillery remain valid in mountains, they are subject to the limitations imposed by the terrain and weather addressed in this chapter. Considerations for targeting, mortars, and air support are also discussed.

Chapter 9 covers the unique challenges that the mountainous environment poses when trying to employ communications equipment.

Chapter 10 focuses on training for mountain and cold region operations, both individually and collectively. Training standards, programs, and expectations are discussed. Specific training venues and standards are addressed to ensure that the Army maintains a high level of inter-operability and to enhance units' war fighting capability in these challenging environments.
