How do we choose a partner for life? What is involved in our choice? A choice on which depend many others: our mental health for one (a troubled marriage can lead to depression, among other things), the children's wellbeing, and even wealth!

By now, everything we know about mate choice shows that people choose emotionally. Love is the trigger. But is this the best way to choose? The bigger number of divorces says otherwise. Many of us want intensity, the irrationality of love. Strong emotions make us feel alive, young, energetic. We sniff at the idea of rationality, because we believe that rationality is cold, it kills emotion. Then we are dominated culturally by the idea that love is something we stumble upon, that we don't control much. We can only bend under its blind force. In other words, we leave to chance one of the most important decisions in life.

But what if we tried to understand love and mate choice? To make love more rational and therefore, more powerful and durable?

This book is a collection of stories about love and marriage. It comes with an analysis of the deep patterns that influence our choices in love, and it offers some criteria for a better evaluation of one's relationship. It also includes a series of interviews with therapists, casting some light upon what makes us choose wrong, and a few techniques that may help us choose better.
