RELATED: Alia Bhatt joins Alec Baldwin to read Harry Potter, but who is this Bollywood star? 'Dangal' Award-winning 2016 film, Dangal, tells the true story of two young Indian girls who beat every chance to become the country's most famous competitive wrestler. The film is loosely based on real-life wrestling champions Mahavir Singh Phogat, and his daughters, Geeta Phogat and Babita Kumari. After pulling in more than $311 million, Dangal is ranked as the highest-grossing Indian film of all time. 'Dil Se' Starring Shah Rukh Khan, Preity Zinta, and Manisha Koirala, Dil Se is one of the most visually and musically beautiful Bollywood films ever made. It tells the story of a radio reporter who meets a mysterious woman on her travels to India's stunning and remote northern region. The soundtrack of the film comes from the Oscar-winning composer A. R. Rahman, with lyrics written by the renowned poet Gulzaar. And he's a cameraman, Santosh Sivan, is one of the best in India. 'Chennai Express' amusing family comedy, Chennai Express follows a man's adventurous trip to southern India when he gets kidnapped because an interesting young woman meets on a train while howling to spread his beloved grandfather's ashes. The film stars Shah Rukh Khan and Deepika Padukone and features colorful music, funny story line, and beautiful choreography. The 'Lagaan' Academy Award-nominated film, Lagaan, is set in the late 1800s during Colonial India's British Paradise. It tells the story of a small village that is ravaged by drought and has to find a way to pay taxes. When a British officer challenges them to a game of cricket with the promise of giving up their taxes if they win, the villagers must come together to play their game The film's soundtrack was produced by A. R. Rahman, which stars Amir Khan, Paul Blackthorne, and Gracy Singh. Jodhaa Akbar tells the story of Mughal Emperor Jhaluddin Mohammad Akbar and his wife, Princess Jodhay of Rajputa. The film, which stars Hrithik Roshan and Aishwariya Rai in titular roles, features lavish costumes and melodic music from A. R. Rahman. Svensk Filmindustri Films from the 1950s are sometimes overshadowed by iconic cinemas of the 1960s and 1970s. However, it would be a mistake to assume that the 1950s were without monumentally important films. Significant developments took place in cinema in the 1950s, including the rise in popularity of global cinema, new approaches to acting and storytelling, and the rise of pioneering directors such as Billy Wilder, Alfred Hitchcock, and John Ford. In chronological order of release date, the following list contains the most important films (though not necessarily the best) released during the 1950s. In the late 1940s, Walt Disney was in dire need of a hit movie. For a decade, his studio has been losing money. Some films played below expectations (original versions of Fantasia and Pinocchio) and Disney spent considerable time and resources making films for the U.S. government during World War II and its aftermath. However, the animated classic Cinderella proved to be such a huge success that it saved the studio's fortune and provided a cute template for many of Disney's consecutive animated classics. Without Cinderella, Disney might never have recovered. Daiiei Motion Picture Company Japanese filmmaker Akira Kurosawa's Rashomon is groundbreaking for the way his narrative is built. One offence is recalculated in court proceedings from four separate unions, each of which is contradictory and pending interpretation. After winning the Golden Lion at the Venice Film Festival and the honorary Oscar prize, Rashomon brought a new level of recognition to Japanese cinema. Kurosawa made several masterpieces in the 1950s, including Ikira (1952), The Seven Samurai (1954), Throne of Blood (1957) and Hidden Fortress (1958). Paramount Pictures After decades of movies toute Hollywood fame, Billy Wilder's Sunset Boulevard was one of the first films to pull back the curtain on the film industry. Reclusive Silent Era star Norma Desmond (Gloria Swanson), now fifty, plots her return to the big screen when down-on-his-luck screenwriter Joe Gillis (William Holden) stumbles on her aging estate. Gillis is slowly learning Desmond's obsession with youth and the star and how being separated from him affects her mental health. Sunset Boulevard was one of the best grossing films of the year and changed public perception of the glamorous Hollywood. 20th Century Fox Like Sunset Boulevard, All About Eve looks at ageism and obsession in the entertainment industry. Hollywood icon Bette Davis stars as a Broadway actress facing the end of her career as she fights a younger opponent. All About Eve received a record 14 Oscar nominations and received six. But his influence was even further achieved because before All About Eve, few actresses over forty were offered major roles in movies. Like Sunset Boulevard, Everything About Eve proved there was room for mature roles for women on screen. Warner Bros. Pictures In the early 1950s they were dominated by Marlon Brando, a fresh-faced Broadway actor whose natural acting style served as inspiration for countless other artists. After the role of Stanley Kowalski was created in Tennessee Williams' The Tramway called Desire on Broadway, Brando reprised the role in a film adaptation directed by Elia Kazan (who also directed the original Broadway production). Brando's work introduced much of the public to a new style of acting that would later become synonymous with actors like James Dean, Al Pacino, and Robert De Niro. Brando and Kazan would later collaborate again in 1954 on the waterfront, another groundbreaking film of the decade. MGM Since talking pictures first became popular in the early 1920s, Hollywood has embraced the accompaniment of the musical. One of the greatest musicals of the decade is Singin' in the Rain, which is itself about actors making the transition from silent films to sound features. Gene Kelly's iconic dance sequence while singing the title song is one of the most memorable scenes in Hollywood history. United Artists developed as an allegory for the on-going Red Scare - in which Hollywood was targeted as a hotbed of communist sympathizers - High Noon is a Western play by Gary Cooper as a small-town marshal who stands alone against a revenge-seeking criminal who is on his way to the city. One by one, the townspeople he protected turned away from him at the time of need. High Noon was one of westerns' first revisionists, and its almost real-time narrative was a narrative device rarely used in film beforehand. 20th Century Fox During the 1950s, Hollywood tried many tricks to combat declining audiences in cinemas, including the use of 3D filmmaking. Another strategy was to increase screen size, especially as a way to combat the growing popularity of television. The robe was the first film introduced in CinemaScope, a widescreen process that soon became the standard across the industry (and continues today). The wide-angle spectacle of the robe led to huge box office success and helped revive interest in biblical epics over the decades, including the Ten Commandments (1956) and Ben-Hur (1959). Toho Film Company Ltd. While Japanese filmmakers like Akira Kurosawa were what was considered art films for Japanese studio Toho, the studio was also releasing more entertainment-driven projects. The biggest of these films was Gogira (better known as Godzilla), a sci-fi film about a massive reptilian animal that attacks Tokyo. Godzilla is one of many science fiction films of the decade to explore the dangers of the atomic age. Although overshadowed by today's special effects, the miniature effects of Godzilla were groundbreaking and influential. Godzilla, its many sequels, and its even more numerous imitators continue to be released today, and Godzilla remains one of the most famous pop culture figures in the world. Warner Bros. Pictures By the mid-1950s, John Wayne had played heroic cowboys on screen for a quarter of a century, with many of his best films directed by John Ford. In The Seekers, Ford and Wayne tell the story of a very different type of cowboy: Ethan Edwards, a conflicted former Confederate soldier whose family is massacred by the band Comanche and his young niece taken captive. Obsessive Edwards becomes increasingly desperate as she spends years searching, leaving viewers to wonder how she will react when she finally finds her. A dark story, wonderful cinematography, and Wayne at his best make The Seekers a celebrated film. Svensk Filmindustri Hollywood movies dominated cinemas around the world during World War II, but in the 1950s filmmakers from around the world began to gain international attention with their work. One of the greatest European directors of the era was Swedish filmmaker Ingmar Bergman. Bergman's first major international success was The Seventh Seal, a film about a knight who is confronted with the personification of death during the Black Sea. The images presented in the Seventh Seal remain iconic decades later. Bergman released the second highly regarded film of the same year, Wild Strawberries. Warner Bros. Pictures years after Universal Pictures moved on from horror movies, British film studio Hammer Film Productions revived the creature's features with a series of sharp, gothic-inspired free remades of Universal's most popular monsters made in color. The first was The Curse of Frankenstein, starring Christopher Lee as the creature and Peter Cushing as Victor Frankenstein. The duo would go on to appear together in many of Hammer's horror elements, and Frankenstein's international success continued to influence horror filmmakers. United Artists Stanley Kubrick is remembered as one of the greatest filmmakers in history. His 1957 film Journeys of Fame, which stars Kirk Douglas as a World War II French military leader who advocates for soldiers who refuse to engage in suicidal advances against German forces, presented a very different perspective than a typical Hollywood war movie. The anti-war themes in the film were rare for post-World War II society, and its uniqueness set Kubrick his pioneering career as a filmmaker. Paramount Pictures Although masterful director Alfred Hitchcock did several masterpieces in the 1950s - Stranger on a Train (1951), Back Window (1954), and North by Northwest (1959), to name a few - the originally under-appreciated Vertigo could be the Master of Suspense to crown the success of the decade. Hitchcock's frequent collaborator James Stewart plays a detective forced to retire because he suffers from dizziness. As a private investigator, he's hired to track down a mystery woman in a complex murder plot. Vertigo's theme obsession continues to engage and confuse viewers, and its revolutionary use of camera techniques are often mimicked, even today. United Artists Comedy films began exploring new themes by the late 1950s. One of the highlights of this survey is some Like It Hot. The film stars Tony Curtis and Jack Lemmon as murder witnesses who disguise themselves as women to avoid being caught by perpetrators. Cross-dressing comedy was considered a very cutting-edge at the time, and Some Like It Hot (along with director Billy Wilder and co-star Marilyn Monroe in perhaps her last big role) helped usher in the groundbreaking 1960s comedy by pushing the envelope in the late 1950s.
