Undergraduate Students students included Mahira Begum, Shamsa Hashi, Tyler Harville, Antwain Monach, Olivia Murray, Naomi Mvou, Kaylah Oates-Marable, and Theuwan White. Graduate Students included Abigail Bowen, Bailey Fairbanks, and Lexie Piccirillo. For this project, we created a survey experiment. This survey experiment used a convenience sample, recruited via social media and personal contacts. The survey was taken by 459 respondents. This survey consisted of 5 groups: one control group and four experimental groups. Respondents were randomly assigned to one of these five groups upon entering the survey link via Qualtrics. The control group was given a prompt "There has been some discussion recently about whether or not to restore the right to vote to citizens who have been convicted of a felony." Each of the other four groups consisted of the same prompt in addition to one of four frames. These frames were race frame, partisan frame, democracy frame, and fundamental 'right frame. The purpose of this experiment was to determine the effect the different prompts had on people's opinions on felon disenfranchisement.
