Introduction

This report on faculty and graduate student employment in 2013 updates the data presented in the 2006 Contingent Faculty Index by the American Association of University Professors, available online at <http://www.aaup.org/reports-publications/publications/see-all/aaup-contingent-faculty-index-2006>. The AAUP report documented a sharp increase in the fraction of college and university faculty who were off the tenure track. From 1975 to 2005, full-time non-tenure track faculty increased from 13.0% of all faculty to 15.6% of all faculty. Even more significantly, part-time faculty, almost all of whom are non-tenure track (see Table 3 below), increased from 30.2% to 47.0% of all faculty. In other words, contingent faculty – the sum of full-time non-tenure track faculty and part-time faculty members – increased from 43.2% to 62.6% of all faculty members. By 2005, only about one out of every three faculty positions in U.S. higher education were tenured or tenure track.

These trends should be of significant concern to everyone who works in or cares about higher education. The AAUP report provides an extended description of the problems facing non-tenure track faculty and the issues their employment poses for colleges and universities, many of which do not seem to care about anything other than driving faculty costs to the lowest possible level. Yet the startling shift away from the tenure system poses deep challenges to higher education. Non-tenure track faculty members are usually poorly paid and are frequently denied benefits. They often lack office space and are excluded from departmental activities and governance. Because they lack the protections of tenure, they effectively lack academic freedom. Often they are not provided with the professional development opportunities needed to develop their research and teaching agendas. They too frequently understandably view themselves as outsiders to the university community. All of this is obviously bad for these faculty members. Perhaps less obviously, it is also bad for students. Teaching conditions add up to learning conditions. Faculty members need resources, stability and security to serve as role models, mentors and advisors for students. Non-tenure track faculty often cannot provide students with the intellectual and professional opportunities they seek when they attend college. This is not because of any failure on their part, but because the colleges and universities that employ them do so on the cheap. As tuition keeps rising, colleges and universities keep spending less and less on instruction and more and more on tangential activities like football. It is a betrayal of the basic ideals of higher education.

Since 2005, the spread of contingency in U.S. higher education as a whole has continued, albeit at a slower pace. Figure 1 compares 2005 data from the AAUP report to 2013 data generated from IPEDS (the Integrated Postsecondary Education Data System produced by the U.S. Department of Education). TEN is full-time tenured faculty, TT is full-time tenure track faculty, NTT is full-time non-tenure track faculty, and PT is part-time faculty. The data cover all accredited, non-medical colleges and universities in the U.S. From 2005 to 2013, full-time non-tenure track positions increased from 15.6% to 18.3% of all faculty positions. In contrast, part-time faculty positions decreased from 47.0% to 45.3% of all faculty positions. The net result of these two trends is an increase in contingent faculty employment from 62.6% to 63.6% of all faculty positions over this period.

It should also be noted that across all colleges and universities, the fraction of all faculty who hold tenure essentially held steady. However, the fraction of all faculty who are not tenured but on the tenure track declined from 11.3% to 9.9%. This is certainly a worrisome predictor of future declines in the fraction of all faculty who hold tenure. The tenure system thus seems likely to continue to weaken.

Figure 2 provides the corresponding figures for doctoral universities. These universities showed an even greater increase in contingent faculty. The fraction of all faculty members at doctoral universities who were full-time non-tenure track increased from 18.6% to 20.7% from 2005 to 2013. Over the same period the fraction of all faculty members who were part-time increased from 29.5% to 32.2%. Consequently, the contingent faculty members at doctoral universities increased from 48.2% to 52.9%. The fraction of all faculty members who held tenure or were on the tenure track correspondingly declined from 51.8% to 47.1%. The trend toward increased contingency continued unabated over this period in doctoral universities.

Figures 3, 4 and 5 show the corresponding trends for masters degree universities, baccalaureate colleges and associates degree colleges. They show similar trends, though there is some variation. Masters degree universities increased the employment of full-time non-tenure track faculty from 12.5% to 15.8% of all faculty positions. However, they decreased the employment of part-time faculty from 48.6% to 45.4% of all faculty positions. Consequently, contingent faculty employment stayed constant at these universities at about 61% of all faculty positions.

At baccalaureate colleges, the employment of full-time non-tenure track faculty increased from 18.1% to 20.3% of all faculty positions. However, part-time faculty employment fell slightly from 37.1% to 36.9% of all faculty positions. The net result is that contingent faculty employment grew from 55.1% to 57.2% of all faculty positions.

At associates degree colleges, full-time non-tenure track employment increased from 14.3% to 16.7% of all faculty positions. Again, part-time faculty employment fell from 65.6% to 63.1% of all faculty positions. The upshot is that contingent faculty employment stayed constant at almost 80% of all faculty employment at these colleges.

The upshot of these contrasts is that contingent faculty employment is increasing most rapidly at doctoral universities. Our largest and most prestigious universities are the ones that are most culpable in the employment trends that are upending the tenure system and spreading low wage labor as a routine means of educating undergraduates.

Notes

1. Data source: 2013 EAP file from IPEDS (<http://nces.ed.gov/ipeds/>) for all variables except for accreditation, which is from the Carnegie Foundation (<http://carnegieclassifications.iu.edu/resources/>).
2. Sample restricted to non-medical regionally accredited colleges and universities.
3. STATE includes U.S. territories and districts as well as states
4. TEN = full-time tenured faculty. TT = full-time tenure track faculty. NTT = full-time non-tenure track faculty or no tenure system available.
5. FT = full time. PT = part-time.
6. CONT = contingent faculty = NTT + PT.
