

Here's How To Go Snowmobiling In Vermont

Going snowmobiling in Vermont is easy. Just register your machine - like you do a car - and then join the Vermont Association of Snow Travelers through a local club, which allows you to use Vermont's trails. The average cost for a visitor for snowmobiling for the entire season is around $60.

For the convenience of out-of-state visitors, VAST and the state have arranged for a network of locations where you can obtain a registration and sign up with a club at the same time - like one-stop shopping. Locations are often motels, snowmobile shops or general stores. Information on where to sign up can be obtained by writing or calling the VAST offices at 802-229-0005, P.O. Box 839, Montpelier, Vt., 05601, or by contacting a club in the list below.

The registration costs $22 and will enable you to go snowmobiling immediately upon your arrival in Vermont. Your registration is valid for the entire season.

Besides registering your snowmobile, state law requires you to sign up with a club and VAST. A VAST membership is like a driver's license. Around 85% of the VAST trail system is located on privately owned land, and by law VAST must get permission from the thousands of property owners whose land is used for snowmobile trails. By joining VAST, out-of-state visitors enjoy this permission and the privilege of using the extensive VAST trail system.

Getting a VAST and club membership is simple. Usually, at the same time you get your registration, you will be signing up to join a club in the area you plan to do most of your trail riding. This dual arrangement provides local clubs with the support that they need to maintain trail grooming and activities.

Club membership fees range upward to $10 and VAST membership for an adult 16 years of age and older is $25. Much of this goes for trail grooming (Example: If you are quoted a membership fee of $33 from the club of your choice, $25 of that is VAST and the remainder is the club's membership fee.)

Anyone under the age of 16 who will be operating a machine must purchase a VAST Junior Membership for $3. The junior operator must be accompanied by an adult operator and have passed a "Snowmobile Safety Course".

When you join VAST, you receive membership cards and decals from the club you select. Decals can be procured only through membership.

The above rules and regulations are shared by all Vermont snowmobilers. As club and VAST members, we heartily welcome you to share the the forest trails, fields, and wonderful mountain scenery of Vermont.

1995-96 VAST CLUB LIST

Listed below are all of Vermont's snowmobile clubs, arranged by county. (See the county map on page A3 for general location).

Every rider who snowmobiles in Vermont, except for those using rental machines, must by law belong to a local club. Local clubs are the backbone of VAST. They do the grooming, hold events and provide the best source for trail and riding information.

The list below includes telephone numbers to get in touch with clubs. Most out-of-state visitors will automatically be joined up with a club when they get a registration at a local agent.

For further information on snowmobiling in Vermont, call VAST between 8-4:30, Monday-Friday, 802-229-0005. There's also a Snowline with recorded riding information and trail conditions at 802-229-4202.

Snow Rage: Taking on the Snowmobile Culture

"Imagine a magical highway that suddenly appears every winter. One that goes through back country and snow-covered mountains, secluded valleys and friendly villages...In Vermont, you don't have to imagine it: It's our winter world of snowmobiling."

— Vermont Association of Snow Travelers

The "magical highways" that the Vermont Association of Snow Travelers (VAST) have carved out of nearly 6,000 miles of Vermont's backcountry for the loud, smelly, and intrusive sport of snowmobiling are anything but "friendly" for a growing number of Vermonters. In fact, just as the number of deaths resulting from snowmobiling are on the rise, so too is the phenomenon known as snowmachine rage — the feverish pitch of anger one reaches after hours, weeks, and months of hearing, seeing, and smelling thousands of slickly painted snowmobiles and the space suit-like clad people who so happily thrust their wrists and blow out a potent blend of pollutants for pleasure.

The mere fact that snowmobilers are now honestly referring to their former trails as "highways" demonstrates the new nature of the "sport." What once was a relatively benign zip through the woods by testosterone-filled local kids has now been transformed into a multi-billion dollar industry that, in some remote northern locales, has literally stolen the peace, trampled on the wild, and belched a blue haze of noxious exhaust.

Increasingly, however, residents in snowmobile areas are speaking out against the many intrusions of the sport. Tired of the noise, smell, and arrogance of the sometimes belligerent snowmobilers, many residents are fighting back by revoking permission to use their land, speaking out about the sport's ecological impacts, and even calling for restrictions on the use of snowmobiles.

The reluctant poster-woman for snowmobile rage, Theresa Remick of Wheelock, Vermont, is an unlikely menace to the hurly-burly world of well-fed snowmobilers. But the petite, 68-year-old resident of Vermont's Northeast Kingdom was taken to her limit last winter when, after numerous civil attempts to keep snowmobiles off her property failed, she decided to take matters into her own hands and speak a language the snowmobilers might understand.

On Sunday, February 21, according to police reports, Remick armed herself with a broom and an unloaded .22 caliber Colt automatic pistol to await the next noisy intruder. After only a few moments of standing in the middle of the Wheelock's own snowmobile highway an unsuspecting rider by the name of Dave Murray came zipping along and was forced to stop and meet Remick's rage.

According to police reports, Remick went right to work expressing her frustration by clubbing Murray's "brand new snowmachine" with her broom. Murray reacted by jumping off his pleasure craft to assess the damage and confront her. But Remick was prepared for the unequal distribution of brawn and brandished her Colt pistol.

"Murray said he backed off and got back on his snowmachine," wrote Vermont State Police Trooper, Gerard Delisle, in his affidavit filed with the Caledonia District Court, "but that the woman would not get out of the way and she was still swinging the broom at him."

One hour on a snowmobile's two-stroke engines produces more smog-forming pollution than a modern car creates in a year.

The sequence then repeated itself, with Murray getting back off his machine, Remick pulling her pistol, and Murray sitting back down. Murray then remembered that he carried a cell phone on his excursions into the big bad woods, and he whipped it out and called the police, who told him to meet them at the Wheelock General Store.

According to Officer Delisle's statement, Remick didn't deny her confrontation with Murray and she handed over her Colt pistol when police approached her for questioning. Remick told Delisle that she confronted the snowmobiler after numerous polite attempts to stop rogue and illegal snowmobiling across her property. Remick also told Delisle that the only reason she pulled the gun was because "she felt that [Murray] was going to run her over with this snowmachine."

Remick was charged with "simple assault by physical menace," a charge that seems to be more appropriate for the snowmobilers. It is a misdemeanor punishable by up to a year in jail and/or up to a $2,000 fine.

Remick hired the area's top criminal defense attorneys, Sleigh and Williams of St. Johnsbury, to defend her. Their first legal maneuver was to request a jury trial that is scheduled to begin on July 6 at the Caledonia District Court in St. Johnsbury. Given Sleigh and Williams' reputation for successful, no-holds-barred defenses, the trial should be quite a shoot-out that will, hopefully, put a bright spotlight on the intrusive nature of snowmobiling and Remick's right to rage.

While Remick's action represents the fact-to-face approach to taking on the snowmachine culture, there's also a burgeoning national movement organizing politically to kick snowmobilers out of national parks such as Yellowstone — a snowmobilers favorite — that is abused by an estimated 120,000 riders every year. Earlier this year the Bluewater Network, a project of David Brower's San Francisco-based Earth Island Network, launched an aggressive campaign with 60 other environmental organizations demanding that the National Park Service (NPS) immediately ban snowmobiling from all national parks.

The Bluewater Network contends that the operation of "grossly polluting machines" such as snowmobiles in national parks violates the Park Service's mission to "conserve the scenery and wildlife...and leave them unimpaired for the enjoyment of future generations."

"The snowmobile industry is making a killing in our most treasured parks, literally," said Sean Smith, Conservation Director of Bluewater Network. "They're killing our wildlife, ruining our air and water quality, poisoning the health of rangers exposed to snowmobile's staggering carbon monoxide exhaust, and destroying the solitude and peace cherished by other winter visitors."

No one argues that the operation of the very inefficient and highly polluting two-stroke engines in snowmobiles are environmentally benign. In fact, even the conservative Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) recently awoke from its snowmobile slumber after learning that these machines emit 25% as many hydrocarbons as all the nations cars and trucks put together. According to EPA research, the nation's 1.3 million snowmobilers emit an estimated 1.1 million tons of hydrocarbons, while 85 million cars and trucks release 4.5 million tons of the same pollutants. And that's just hydrocarbons, only one of the noxious components of the snowmobile's toxic soup of emissions that also includes carbon monoxide, nitrous oxides, MTBE, and particulate matter.

The staggering levels of pollution from the snowmobile's two-stroke engine is caused by the fact that only two-thirds of the fuel is burned, spewing the rest directly into the air.

"According to the California Air Resource Board," reports Bluewater's Smith, "one hour on a snowmobile's two-stroke engines produces more smog-forming pollution than a modern car creates in a year."

The Bluewater Network and its broad coalition point to a 1996 report that found "the highest carbon monoxide (CO) levels in the nation were recorded at Yellowstone's west entrance during the snowmobile season. The CO levels were so high, in fact, that a lingering blue haze of emissions is common in the winter months at Yellowstone and Park Rangers in the area have routinely complained of the dizziness, headaches, throat irritation, nausea caused by snowmobile emissions.

The EPA is expected to address this pollution problem by releasing its first ever emission standards for the two-stroke engines that power snowmobiles, personal watercraft (e.g., Jet Skis), and all-terrain-vehicles (ATV's), a move that is expected to force manufacturers to switch to four-stroke engines — the type of engine used in cars.

Regardless of the outcomes of Remick's trial and the political lobbying against snowmobiles, proponents of the sport are getting nervous about the level of opposition building up. So much so that many snowmobile enthusiasts are now advocating the abandonment of the two-stroke engine, a position that would have been considered heretical a few years ago when they steadfastly defended it as cheaper, easier to start, and a faster accelerator than the dramatically less polluting four-stroke engines.

It's clear that snowmobilers and their lobbying interests are counting on a switch to four-stroke engines to dampen down some of the sport's growing opposition. But while significant pollution concerns will be addressed by the soon-to-be-mandated change, issues such as wildlife impacts, disturbing the peace, and four-stroke engine pollution will remain. And these issues are just as capable of creating snowmachine rage in the likes of Remick, backwoods enthusiasts, and proponents of real national parks that are free from snowmachine highways.

Stay tuned, because this battle is only just beginning...

VAST: Manufacturing Tradition

The primary promotional arm of snowmobiling in Vermont is the Vermont Association of Snow Travelers (VAST), a $2.5 million outfit that receives about 25% of its funding from the state via snowmobile registration fees paid to the Department of Motor Vehicles.

VAST's political clout became abundantly clear last winter when the 133,000 acres of slashed land owned by the paper giant, Champion International, went up for sale in the Northeast Kingdom. VAST panicked when it learned that the federal government was to be a part of a consortium of buyers that had conservation in mind for the land, including potential restrictions on ecologically threatening uses such as snowmobiling.

But VAST flexed its political muscles in Montpelier and gained one assurance after another, from Governor Dean on down, that the land would remain open to snowmobile abuse. Dean even went so far as to make the Dan Quayle-like statement that the state would not tolerate restrictions on land that had enjoyed "hundreds of years of being open for traditional uses like hunting, hiking, logging, and snowmobiling."

Hundreds of years of traditional snowmobiling? So that's how the Abenakis got around.
