There was a great deal of interest in the work of the committee, and they invited them into the house. They are not inclined to adopt any plan which may be disapproved of by the fathers of Christ. While at the house, they besought of the fathers, or rather of the Lord, to give them some assistance in their work. They are not inclined to adopt any plan which may be disapproved of by the fathers of Christ. While at the house, they besought of the fathers, or rather of the Lord, to give them some assistance in their work.
The Sabbath Recorder.

April 26, 1866.

ARTICLES.

THE AMENITY OF THE AMENITIES.

The amenities being the great requisites of life, it seems a very small matter to have any of these intruding into the midst of our daily business, or to make them the subject of our conversation, or to regard them in any way as anything but as trite and tiresome.

But there is a great deal to be said in favor of the amenities. They are a great comfort to the weary man, and a great source of pleasure to the happy man. They are a great source of joy to the happy man, and a great source of comfort to the weary man. They are a great source of comfort to the weary man, and a great source of joy to the happy man. They are a great source of joy to the happy man, and a great source of comfort to the weary man.

The amenities being the great requisites of life, it seems a very small matter to have any of these intruding into the midst of our daily business, or to make them the subject of our conversation, or to regard them in any way as anything but as trite and tiresome.

But there is a great deal to be said in favor of the amenities. They are a great comfort to the weary man, and a great source of pleasure to the happy man. They are a great source of joy to the happy man, and a great source of comfort to the weary man.

The amenities being the great requisites of life, it seems a very small matter to have any of these intruding into the midst of our daily business, or to make them the subject of our conversation, or to regard them in any way as anything but as trite and tiresome.

But there is a great deal to be said in favor of the amenities. They are a great comfort to the weary man, and a great source of pleasure to the happy man. They are a great source of joy to the happy man, and a great source of comfort to the weary man.

The amenities being the great requisites of life, it seems a very small matter to have any of these intruding into the midst of our daily business, or to make them the subject of our conversation, or to regard them in any way as anything but as trite and tiresome.

But there is a great deal to be said in favor of the amenities. They are a great comfort to the weary man, and a great source of pleasure to the happy man. They are a great source of joy to the happy man, and a great source of comfort to the weary man.

The amenities being the great requisites of life, it seems a very small matter to have any of these intruding into the midst of our daily business, or to make them the subject of our conversation, or to regard them in any way as anything but as trite and tiresome.

But there is a great deal to be said in favor of the amenities. They are a great comfort to the weary man, and a great source of pleasure to the happy man. They are a great source of joy to the happy man, and a great source of comfort to the weary man.

The amenities being the great requisites of life, it seems a very small matter to have any of these intruding into the midst of our daily business, or to make them the subject of our conversation, or to regard them in any way as anything but as trite and tiresome.

But there is a great deal to be said in favor of the amenities. They are a great comfort to the weary man, and a great source of pleasure to the happy man. They are a great source of joy to the happy man, and a great source of comfort to the weary man.

The amenities being the great requisites of life, it seems a very small matter to have any of these intruding into the midst of our daily business, or to make them the subject of our conversation, or to regard them in any way as anything but as trite and tiresome.

But there is a great deal to be said in favor of the amenities. They are a great comfort to the weary man, and a great source of pleasure to the happy man. They are a great source of joy to the happy man, and a great source of comfort to the weary man.

The amenities being the great requisites of life, it seems a very small matter to have any of these intruding into the midst of our daily business, or to make them the subject of our conversation, or to regard them in any way as anything but as trite and tiresome.

But there is a great deal to be said in favor of the amenities. They are a great comfort to the weary man, and a great source of pleasure to the happy man. They are a great source of joy to the happy man, and a great source of comfort to the weary man.