OF THE CHARACTER OF THE CHRISTIAN TESTIMONY.

By the Native Correspondent.

As the questions with which this number is opened are important, and the subject itself is so closely connected with the present crisis, we must begin our remarks upon the subject, by endeavoring to trace the source of that energy and self-control which are characteristic of the truly Christian life. It is not enough to say that these are the natural result of the labors and sufferings of the world, or that they spring from a sense of the value of our own souls, or from a fear of punishment. We have seen that these are the result of a personal experience of the grace of God, and that they are the natural result of a personal experience of the grace of God. We have seen that these are the result of a personal experience of the grace of God, and that they are the natural result of a personal experience of the grace of God. We have seen that these are the result of a personal experience of the grace of God, and that they are the natural result of a personal experience of the grace of God.

The character of the Christian testimony is as follows: It is not a mere profession of faith, but a personal experience of the grace of God. It is not a mere profession of faith, but a personal experience of the grace of God. It is not a mere profession of faith, but a personal experience of the grace of God. It is not a mere profession of faith, but a personal experience of the grace of God.
