Theological Teachings of the Seventh Day.

The doctrines of the Lord's Day, which are taught in the early chapters of the Reformed Church, have been the subject of much controversy and dispute among the orthodox and the non-orthodox denominations. The main points of contention are the authority of the church, the nature of the sacraments, and the interpretation of the Bible. The orthodox church holds that the authority of the church is derived from the Holy Scriptures, and that the sacraments are the means of grace by which the grace of God is communicated to the members of the church. The non-orthodox church, on the other hand, holds that the authority of the church is derived from the tradition of the church, and that the sacraments are the symbols of the grace of God, and not the means of grace.

In the case of the Lord's Day, the orthodox church holds that the Lord's Day is a day of worship, and that the worship of the Lord's Day is the means of grace by which the grace of God is communicated to the members of the church. The non-orthodox church, on the other hand, holds that the Lord's Day is a day of rest, and that the rest of the Lord's Day is the means of grace by which the grace of God is communicated to the members of the church.

The American Sabbath-keepers Society holds that the Lord's Day is a day of rest, and that the rest of the Lord's Day is the means of grace by which the grace of God is communicated to the members of the church. The society holds that the Lord's Day is a day of rest, and that the rest of the Lord's Day is the means of grace by which the grace of God is communicated to the members of the church.
