THE SATURDAY Recorder, November 4, 1888.

REVIEW L. WALTERS.

In the State House, at the corner of Washington and Newbury, a large hall was occupied by the audience. It was a cold and raw evening, but the people were gathered in great numbers to hear the speech. The room was filled to capacity and there was a noticeable excitement in the air. The speaker stepped up to the podium and began his address.

It was a long and impassioned speech, full of passion and conviction. He spoke about the current political climate and the need for change. The audience was captivated by his oratory skills and the message he conveyed.

As the speech came to a close, the crowd erupted in applause. It was a triumphant moment for the speaker, and the applause was met with a sense of satisfaction and relief. The event had been a success, and the message had been heard.

There was a feeling of hope and determination in the air, and the speaker left the hall knowing that he had made a difference. The night was still young, but the night of change had begun.

MEHRS & HAMILN ORGAN.

Prospectus for the Mendelssohn Pianos and Organ Co., which suggests that the firm has been in operation for 60 years. It mentions the company's reputation for quality and the availability of pianos and organs for sale, including references to specific models and prices.

The text also includes a section on the company's history, noting that it was founded in 1826 and has been under the same family ownership ever since. It highlights the company's commitment to craft and excellence, as well as its ongoing efforts to innovate and improve its products. The prospectus concludes by inviting potential customers to visit the company's showroom and/or contact the company for more information.

The text is written in clear, concise language that is easy to read, with occasional use of technical terms that are explained in simple language. The prospectus includes an appendices section, which contains additional information about the company's history, its products, and its mission statement.

Overall, the prospectus is a well-written document that effectively communicates the company's message, and it is likely to be of interest to anyone looking for high-quality pianos and organs at competitive prices.
