Monkeys Call OR Call the Monkeys?

The mobile phone rings, for a second time, within seconds from the first. The caller identity, not significantly different from the first call, hinted at the calls origin. This was all that was required to decide not to answer, again.

Think about it, what would you do if you had just found out that the caller is known to be the one currently stabbing you from the front?

Add the fact that you have found evidence that this same caller is in fact the mastermind behind the team stabbing you from behind, consistently, up until this point.

Seriously, would You answer?

It is of course no use broadcasting the fact that you know the truth about past events, as these have helped identify the current and probable future threats.

So when the call rings for the third time AND the number is “Anonymous”, the PERFECT opportunity presents itself for you to answer THIS call; if you wanted to show a little “up yours” to the caller by confirming that you are actively avoiding their calls. (Provided the caller was the same person attempting to call seconds before.)

In this heightened sense of stress, allowing yourself a little “up yours” seems like a great outlet for the stress created by the caller, without hinting at knowledge of the War Games currently being played out.

And in this story it is the option that was taken. In hindsight it was wrong. In that it did reveal knowledge of the War Games being played.

All the callee needed was the slightest hint that there was knowledge of what was afoot.

What transpired in this phone call was UNABASHEDLY ARROGANT. And entirely effective.

This phone-call which lasted a few seconds was a book-end to the information gathering exercise of finding out if there was knowledge about what the caller and his team were doing.

All it took was a stressful situation, incessant calls and not letting up until they received a response.

Call Transcript @ Appendix 1

The call was disconcerting and none of the content can be proven, as the call was made to a mobile phone.

This was one of the callers “tricks” so as not to leave evidence, lest their company name be brought up officially in any case involving ethics.

Can you identify the callers country from the corporate antics mentioned so far?

The callers companies’ Annual Statements include a barometer in which they applaud themselves when not being publicly named in anything untoward with regard to the ethics of doing business in the past year. As if this is a reason to do it, but not be caught.

The origin countries involved in this phone call have long had history.

The callers’ company situated within a country that played host to the oldest trading company in the world and the callees’ company being headquartered on one of their original trade routes, on the tip of Africa.
