The department of defense has an industrial base with more than 300,000 contractors who provide goods and services—and many of those businesses hold highly sensitive national security information. To better secure this supply chain, DOD has launched a program called the cybersecurity maturity model certification (CMMC). This SNG live virtual session will focus on the latest in the development of CMMC and the impacts it will have on the defense contracting community.

Agencies are improving their cybersecurity posture to some degree, particularly as they develop better basic cyber hygiene and modernize their legacy systems. At the same time, bad actors are getting better at finding new ways to attack and access federal IT. During DC CyberWeek, SNG Live will bring together federal cybersecurity leaders for a conversation on how they continue to mature their cybersecurity defenses and what the best strategies are for staying ahead of adversaries.

Last year, the Trusted Internet Connections program got a welcomed update in TIC 3.0. The new model is meant to be more flexible in the age of the cloud, allowing agencies to pilot new use cases that can be approved for their unique needs. This SNG Live virtual session will highlight the latest in the development of TIC 3.0 and what’s coming next for the model.
