Week ending April 26, 2024

Economic data this week did not move as the Federal Reserve may have wished. The preliminary estimates for first quarter GDP came in below expectations at a 1.6% annual rate, much lower than the fourth quarter rate of 3.4%. In addition to this news, the Federal Open Market Committee's (FOMC) favored inflation metric, the Personal Consumption Expenditure (PCE) index came in at a slightly higher annual rate than was expected, indicating inflationary pressures continue to persist.

Fixed Income Markets Overview

- U.S. Treasury yields were up again with the 2-year Treasury breaking above 5% early in the week.
- Mortgage rates continued to climb higher as the average 30-year mortgage rose to an average rate of 7.17% according to Freddie Mac.
- Look for a refunding announcement by the Treasury Department this week. Current expectations are looking for the Treasury to keep the amount of issuance steady after increasing levels over the past three quarters.
- The University of Michigan Consumer Sentiment Index fell last week after hitting a 3 year high back in March. Participants raised their expectations for inflation to the highest level since last fall.

Equity Markets Overview

- Despite the disappointing GDP figures, earnings reports drove the equity markets higher this week following three weeks of losses. The Nasdaq saw the largest increase with a gain of 4.2%, the S&P was up 2.7%, and the DJIA saw an increase of 0.7%.
- All 11 of the S&P sectors were positive for the week with Information technology leading the group posting a return of 5.1%
- Technology earnings reports were a driver behind this week's gains, but not all of them were positive. Alphabet, Microsoft, and Google all exceeded estimates, but Facebook parent Meta provided a weak revenue outlook.
- Other positive earnings reports came from UPS, Chipotle, and Comcast, while Exxon and Southwest Airlines fell below expectations.
- Look for another large slate of earnings reports this week including Coca-Cola, McDonalds, Amazon, CVS Health, and Apple.

Alternative Markets Overview

- The price of oil was up by 1.4% this week, but gold finally paused its recent rally, giving back 1.5% by Friday.
- Another metal that has been in the news is copper, which the price increased by over 18% since the start of the year. Copper demand is projected to increase due to the growth of electric vehicles and AI technology, but concerns over supply have driven the price to a 2 year high this past week.
- The price of Bitcoin initially rose this week following the halving event last Friday but closed the week down 0.7%.
