Schools finances in rough shape

Hillsborough schools set a vote to borrow $75 million to meet operating expenses.

TAMPA — Superintendent Addison Davis faced a skeptical School Board last week over his plans to save money by cutting staff.

But all that changed less than 48 hours later, when he hit them with news that they must borrow soon to meet operating expenses.

The school district's cash reserves are projected to dwindle to $9 million in early November. "That's about one day's worth of expenses," chief financial officer Gretchen Saunders told the board Thursday.

To avoid the risk of running out of money, the district wants to issue a tax anticipation note, a form of short-term financing used by other school districts in similar situations.

School Board members did not object, and they vowed to support the administration's efforts to rein in spending.

This second conversation took place at "agenda review," a new kind of workshop Davis introduced when he took over this year.

While the agenda review is noticed under the Florida public meetings law, it happens without any video cameras or live-streaming. The Tampa Bay Times receives audio recordings a day or two afterwards.

That's not the only difference

DeSantis opens economy, but locally masks remain

Florida's shift into Phase 3 causes some turmoil over face covering mandates.

BY TRACEY MCMANUS

When Gov. Ron DeSantis lifted coronavirus-related restrictions on business capacity and operations on Friday, his order did not repeal local mandates that require masks in indoor public places.

But the shift to the last phase of the state's reopening plan has caused local government officials and business owners to have to reiterate face covering requirements that went into effect in Pinellas and Hillsborough counties and Tampa earlier this summer — and remain in place today.

"Within 15 minutes of his announcement we had four groups of people walk in our door and say 'we don't have to wear masks anymore, the governor said so,'" said Ken Hamilton, co-owner of Palm Pavilion on Clearwater Beach. "We said no, not exactly. That's the unintended consequence of the governor's order: turmoil."

Although DeSantis' Phase 3 reopening order did not lift city and county mask requirements, it took away those municipalities' ability to impose fines on individual violators. But officials in Pinellas, Hillsborough and Tampa say the enforcement strategy to date has been more educational than punitive anyway.

And while counties and cities may not impose penalties on individual violators, DeSantis' order does not appear to prohibit fines for businesses that are not enforcing the local rules. "In the governor's order, he prohibits penalties on individuals but not to businesses, so we strongly encourage businesses to require masks both for the safety of their employees and the safety of their patrons," Tampa spokesperson Ashley See MASKS, 10A
