GOLDIE

Synopsis

Not even the vibrant streets of the Bronx can contain Goldie (Slick Woods), a street-wise 18-year-old whose intoxicating dreams of fame – and the better life she believes it will bring for herself and her family – are all but contagious. But it’s only when Goldie’s dreams collide with the harsh realities of her world that she discovers her true strength in writer/director Sam de Jong’s bittersweet coming-of-age story.

Though she may live in a shelter, sharing a single room with her mother, Carol (Marsha Stephanie Blake), her partner Frank (Danny Hoch) and kid-sisters Sherrie, 8, and Supreme, 12 (Alanna Renee Tyler-Tompkins and Jazmyn C. Dorsey), Goldie’s dream of a better life is not only palatable, but seems to sustain those closest to her. An enthusiastic dancer who enjoys performing on the community center’s makeshift stage, she is offered a chance by the well-connected Jay (Khris Davis) to submit an audition tape to local-legend, Tiny (A$AP Ferg), a rapper planning to shoot a music video that weekend.

Inspired by the prospect, bristling with attitude and a winsome gap-toothed style all her own (and now pocketing $300 she’s lifted from the shady, Frank), Goldie’s plan is simple – get the additional $300 needed to purchase the canary yellow fur coat on display at a local store to complete her look for her screen debut, and fulfill her destiny.

The execution of that plan, however, proves more than problematic.

Fired from her day job, Goldie, nevertheless, pursues her dream with reckless abandon. With the help of her younger sisters, she manages to shoot a winning audition tape with her phone on the shelter’s rooftop. But not soon after, the rug is pulled out from under her family with the arrival of the police at their door with a warrant for their mother’s arrest. Knowing that child services will be arriving shortly to take her two sisters away (likely placing them in different homes, separating the family), Goldie takes off with her siblings in-tow. Still a child herself, she embarks on a dangerous odyssey across the Bronx in search of friends, distant family – anyone who will take them in, if only until Goldie can shoot her music video.

With the weekend shoot quickly approaching, the canary yellow fur coat in the storefront window thus becomes her personal talisman. And her desire to possess it - by hook or by crook - becomes an all-consuming obsession with its perceived promise of transformation, not only for own life, but for that of her family as well.

Director’s Statement

I first started thinking about this movie in 2012, before I made my first feature, Prince. After moving to New York, I discovered that 20th Century Fox and VICE Films were interested in making a movie with me. We all knew that I first needed to do as much research as I could, and move to the USA, to be able to write this film. It was around that time that I first met with Slick Woods, who was as excited to collaborate with me as I was to collaborate with her. I soon learned that she had a similar life-story to the one I’d written in that very early draft of the script. And that’s when I really started writing. After that initial meeting, my ideas on how to approach the film began to change. I progressed through a series of rewrites over the course of a year or so. I knew that Slick was my Goldie, but I also spoke with other girls and boys with similar experiences to get to the script that we eventually filmed.

The cast is a mix of professionals and non-professionals, and the casting directors, Kate Antognini and Damian Bao, put in an incredible amount of work to that end. The character of José, for example, is played by José Fernandez, someone who is originally from the Bronx, who had recently been released from prison, and who had never acted before. Others, like Angela Griszell who plays Princess, we found through open-call auditions. We basically tried to get a combination of professional actors - like Marsha Blake and Gbenga Akinnagbe - and non-professionals, assembled around Slick, who could feed off each other and inspire one another.

This a story about a young person who suddenly finds herself displaced in New York City. But for me, in a more universal way, it’s about finding your identity in a highly individualistic world where the only thing that’s close to religion (in terms of its transformative power), is self-expression. Goldie’s personal journey begins with an opportunity to make a music video that she, in a romanticized way, sees as a means of escaping the ordeal she’s facing – finding a real home for herself and her sisters. She instead has to come to terms with the reality of her life and her own vulnerability and shortcomings.

We shot the movie in the summer of 2017 over the course of 21 days with a small crew. There was a heatwave while we were filming, which made it more of a challenge, but I think it actually helped us in terms of telling the story, adding another texture as Goldie and her sisters make their journey through the city, and even in terms of the character’s fixation with the fur coat (a new skin and therefore a new identity), which she believes she must have for her ultimate success.

The idea of working with the animated/graphic elements the way we do was always in my mind, but we didn’t fully flesh that out until we finally started cutting the movie. Mostly, I liked it as a way of keeping the girls, the two sisters, alive in the story, by being able to feel their presence throughout the movie and using their voices to launch each section. Their voices, combined with the animation, adds that element of a child’s eye-view, which I also thought was an interesting juxtaposition to the harshness of the reality that we see.

It’s hard to make a movie in New York. I had come from the Netherlands and suddenly found myself working in a new place with totally new people. Every single person I had to get to know and learn to trust – from me submitting my first draft to my producers who had never seen any of my work, to all the different department heads and cast members. It was a challenge at first, but I really came to enjoy that challenge. I learned a lot from it and made some friends for life.

At the end of the day, I hope that the story touches audiences. That’s the most important thing. And I hope that people are captivated by Slick and the way she managed to portray Goldie’s journey. For me, just working with all these amazing people – from the producers, to the cast, the crew, to Slick – was such a profound experience. Coming from Amsterdam, moving to New York and making an indie-film... with a studio whose films I grew up with... I’m just realizing now that I’m finally finished, it’s pretty surreal. I’m humbled by that. I’m humbled that everyone wanted to go on this adventure with me. And I’m proud of the work we’ve done.
