The pandemic not only exacerbated economic challenges, it also deepened inequities that impact financial stability, economic mobility and quality of life.

United Way goes beyond responding to immediate needs. We’re helping people recover. We’re a vital force in rebuilding resilient communities where everyone can thrive.

Nowhere is that more important than in financial stability and economic mobility. Across the world, United Way works in 1,100 communities to increase economic mobility. We’re offering job training, financial coaching and education. And we’re connecting people to food, housing, mental health services, and other available local resources.

With the help of our partners—including 45,000 companies across the globe—we’re offering hope and help where it’s needed the most. Every year, United Way impacts 48 million people. Most recently, our work in financial stability has helped:

• Almost 1.3 million people access affordable housing, financial products and services
• 472,231 people get job-skills training for career opportunities
• 40% of people served by United Way programs increase their wages

As the world’s largest privately funded nonprofit, United Way is at work in 95% of the U.S. and across 37 countries and territories. We take community-building seriously, but we do it with a global reach and hyper-local focus. We help people invest in local solutions, bringing people together — though charitable giving, volunteerism or public policy advocacy — to make life better for our neighbors.

Together, we can Live United.
