Agile methodology interview questions and answers

Tell yourself is one of the most common interview questions, but many job candidates draw a blank in an attempt to come up with a strong answer. While the question may seem simple, it is open-ended, and to respond concisely and effectively is difficult. However, through practice and preparation, you can avoid common mistakes and make a good impression on your potential employer. Chelsea Goodman, president and career height expert at Got The Job, says one of the rookie mistakes candidates make when asked about themselves is giving away too much. More often, people are prepared with answers about their strengths and weaknesses, links from previous roles, but when asked this question they will start talking about their children or activities they like to do outside of work, and that is not the point of this question, says Goodman.Instead, be focused. Here are three points you want to cover when answering this question in an interview. Goodman says your answer should be short, like a lift pitch. Avoid telling your whole life story. Instead, sit down for a minute to find out the most relevant information about you and your professional life. Start by thinking about how your current role has helped you improve your strengths and weaknesses. If you manage a team, describe your responsibilities and add specific examples of initiatives or projects that you oversee daily. You want to emphasize an experience that allows you to qualify for the role, so try to be more selective about the information you share. The impression you give in the first couple of minutes of a conversation will shape how that person thinks, says Goodman. There are many people who don't start with the right foot and then they have to recover from it all because they couldn't answer the simplest question, which is not meant to be a 20-minute spiel about their lives. Ideally, the role you are applying for will go to the next level. Mention where you see yourself in the future and how, if given the opportunity, the role will determine the stage that will help you achieve those career goals. Come up with some long-term goals and a period of time in which you expect to achieve them. You want to know what you can do about the company, because it's important to you, Berger says. It suggests that the formation of its goals thus shows that these potential relationships can be mutually beneficial. Let's say the position is looking for a candidate who is willing to work flexible hours instead of a set schedule, or take different projects at once. Mention how and why your situation has made you well positioned, and we are glad to rise to this challenge. The employer wants to know what value their company would bring, says Lynn Berger, New York career counselor and coach at Lynn Berger. The best way to do this is to provide specific related to what the work is. It offers pre-interview breakdown job description, combing through each line and examples of relevant situations where you have given positive results and how these results turn into the role you want to assume. In this case, tell me about yourself really means: Tell me why you would be well suited to this role. Berger says that your answers should always be honest but thoughtful. The goal is to correctly tailor your answers to match what the company is looking for. More from Grow: As nice as you may be, that great job interview is coming up, you're probably also nervous and we all know it's hard to look and sound impressive when your heart is pounding and your brain is going into combat or flight mode. But do not be afraid, because some simple preparations make the world a difference. When you go feeling more confident, you can even find yourself enjoying the conversation. These are just some of the most common interview questions you'll need to be prepared for. They are also some of the most difficult to answer. Interview Question 1: Tell me about yourself. Interlocutors usually lead with this, and while this should be the easiest answer of all, sometimes it's the hardest. Your mind starts to course through endless files of information, trying to select a few relevant facts. Is the interlocutor looking for a simple, nonsense answer? Are they looking for something that will wow them? Do they really want to know about their passion for artisan cheeses, or should you keep that second interview? How not to answer: Well, my Enneagram number / Myers-Briggs type /star sign is . . . I'm the seventh of nine children. I grew up in Tulsa and go back there sometimes on holidays . . . I'm a little night owl . . . It sounds like I'm referring to the obvious, but you'll be surprised how many people draw a blank interview and start reciting their autobiography. There is nothing wrong with giving personal data, but at this stage of the game they should join the work in some way. (Of course, if an interviewer asks about your family or interests, it is different). How to answer: Here's the deal – the hiring manager is trying to understand not only who you are as a person, but also how really passionate you are about this role. Keep it relevant and let your passion in your area come through. Prepare for this question by thinking about how you got to where you are today- what led you to pursue this career and this work? Why is this work important to you? Consider structuring your answer a little like this: I love ___ for as long as I remember. I really wanted to further develop my skills in this area, which I by _____. This ultimately led to opportunities to do ____ and _____. I want to bring that experience and knowledge to this company so I can help as many people as possible. Obviously, that will change to fit your story. But usually try to include detailed information about your past experiences in this area and connect it to why you're doing what you're doing now and where you want to go from here. Interview question 2: Why did you leave your last job / Why do you want to leave your current job? This is another of the most common interview questions (and one of the most likely to travel up to the candidates). Best practices here must be honest, but do not go to all the horrible details (unless more information is requested). If you left an easy explanation for reasons such as your work was in a seasonal position or your family needed to move, great! If this was a more difficult situation, there are some to do and not. How unanswered: You won't believe how terrible my last boss was. My co-workers were petty and talked about me behind my back. I always had to work late and on weekends, and I got sick. My manager yelled at me if I was even just five minutes late to work. They really didn't know what they were doing as a company. I've never had a chance to lead a meeting. Or a project. Or anything. All of these can be a very fair reason why you left your job (or were asked to leave). I want to be honest, but you also have to be careful with the tone and wording of your response. You should never sound as if you were complaining, whining, or mouthing your former boss or peers badly, even if they made your life miserable. Even if you have been fired, there is a better way to approach the topic. How to answer: The most important thing for the interlocutor to know is that no matter what happened, you have learned and grown from it and are actively working to improve the movement forward. Try to frame the real reason why you left positive statements by explaining what you've learned and how you plan to use this information in the future. For example, if you left because of a bad work environment, you could say something like this: I work best in a corporate culture where everyone supports and is honest, and unfortunately I realized that there are bigger problems in the company that do not match my values. However, I am grateful for the experience and have learned that a healthy corporate culture is an essential part of finding my job. If you were let go, you could say something like this: I was excited to try a new line of work and thought I would be a good fit because of my skills ____ and my previous experience _____. But when I started working, I found that I misunderstood the requirements of the work and there had to be more communication ahead about the skill level required for this particular job. My manager and I agreed, I'm not a good fit, but in the meantime, I on my communication skills and honing my craft in other areas doing _____. Regardless of the situation, do not forget to go with humility and positivity. And never lie about your experience - the truth of the hiring manager is just one phone call. Interview Question 3: What is your greatest weakness/strength? Now comes the awkward part where you can feel like you either throw yourself under the bus or shout your praise from the rooftops. With the right attitude and wording, you do not need to do any of these things. As with the question of why you left your job, it is best to be honest and show how you work to overcome weakness (but do not unpack any emotional baggage). For the strengths, be modest, but know the value of your skills. How not to answer: I really don't have any flaws. I had better research than anyone else in my last company. I'm angry when people don't meet for the first time. I have time management problems and always seem to fall behind. I'm a perfectionist. How to answer: When talking about strengths, try not to give common answers. Everyone will say that they are a hard worker and like to do a good job. Instead, find the personal traits and skills gained from the experience that separate you and make you a valuable asset for the company. Remember that this answer is a job description, and try to emphasize the strengths that you really have to match what they are looking for. Instead of simply naming strength, consider giving an example of the time you used it in the action, or the person who indicated that force. For example, you could say something like this: My former manager told me that he didn't know what the team would do without my communication skills and ability to solve problems in difficult situations. In fact, although I was not in the leadership role, he asked me to lead several projects. In this way you come across as humble and confident! When talking about shortcomings, show that you have enough conscience to know where your problem areas are. Then explain how you deal with that weakness and how we try to improve. For example: I'm not great with details. I'm a big picture thinker and I'm about to step in, so I sometimes shine through small but important things. I challenge myself to ask more specific questions and make sure I have all the information before charging into a project that I am excited about. Interview Question 4: What salary do you expect to receive? Talking about salary is never convenient. No one wants to sell themselves short, but sometimes people are also afraid to name a number that looks ridiculously big to the interlocutor. Some companies may require you to specify an exact number or at least a pay interval so be prepared with some numbers just in case. However, if they are not saturated, you do not need to name the number. You have done this, you can automatically limit the number you quoted when the company may be willing to pay more. Do your research job search sites like, in fact, or Glassdoor find out what market value is behind this position. Then, when asked a question, say something like My Expectation is that I would be paid market value. Interview question 5: Of all applicants, why do you think you need to get a job? When it comes to this general interview question, you have to be prepared to justify why you are very suited to the company and not just to auction strengths. It can be frightening to think of all the other people who apply for this position and how you can or may not appreciate up to them. Instead of focusing on comparison, focus on what you bring to the table and what value you would create for your business. How not to answer: um . . . I have a lot of experience. I'm punctual. I'm a quick learner. I know I'd take a better job than anyone else. You don't want to repeat the list of strengths that you said to the interviewer earlier, nor do you want to say what all the other candidates will say, even if it's true. There may be more than a thousand people applying for this job, which is just as punctual as you. What's your different? How to answer: Your strengths may certainly be part of your answer, but they shouldn't be your full answer. Think of all the checkpoints you're looking for if you were a hiring manager. Is this person perfectly in tune with the culture of the company? Do they have competitive experience? Do they care about and on in their work? Then find a way to briefly touch all those points. Your answer should sum up your passion for the company, how your unique combination of skills and strengths will bring value, how your past jobs have equipped you with this one, and any major accomplishments you have had in your field that would set you apart from other candidates. Add any other meaningful information that indicates that you have personally invested in this role. It's your time to be brave! Keep in mind that it's important to include specific examples so you can back up what you're saying. The interlocutor not only wants to hear information about you, they want to know why this information makes you the best person for the job. Questions you should never ask in your interview: The interviewer will not be the only one who asked questions in your interview! Any good hiring manager will ask if you have any questions, and you should be prepared to ask some. However, there are some issues that send the wrong message to your interlocutor and can seriously harm your ability to move forward: Process. Here are some of the How much sick time/leave would I get? If I get all the hours, can my schedule be flexible? Do you check your employees' social media accounts? What policy if I came late? So what exactly does this company do? How quickly can I get promoted from this position? How often do you give raises to your employees? Do you have a drug test for all your employees? How many warnings do you give before you shoot someone? Hopefully I don't need to explain why these are not big questions. Just use common sense and don't ask questions about salary, benefits or anything that makes you sound like an escaped convict, and you will just be fine! The right questions to ask the interlocutor: What types of people are doing here? How will my performance be measured and how often can I expect feedback on my work? Does any team member work remotely? (Depending on the position, you may want to wait until the second or third conversation and ask for this conversation.) What is corporate culture like you can give me some examples of how this plays out in a typical work week? Does this company provide employees with any opportunities to provide additional training or professional development? Such questions show that you are eager to learn and get excited about the opportunity. If you need more tips on how to separate the rental process, check out my Get Hired Digital course.
