Saturday Night Live announced on March 4 that Scarlett Johansson will host and Lorde will guest the music on the March 11 episode of the NBC series. The musician just released his new song Green Light, and it's a tune that Lorde will perform on SNL, most likely. But remember: music guests on SNL sing twice throughout the episode and that means Lorde could debut another new song in the second performance slot after Belting Out Green Light. Sure, there's always a chance she could sing one instead of her other hits, but I'm choosing to be hoping for even more new Lorde music. Johansson will host the March 11 episode as she promotes her new film Ghost in the Shell, while Lorde has made a big comeback in the past week. Her new single Green Light, released last week, doesn't miss a beat and she announced her upcoming album Melodrama, which is due to drop this summer, according to Pitchfork. It's very exciting for Lorde fans and music lovers, because they've been – as she sings in green light – waiting for it and wanting new music from the artist for a long time. Lorde's 2013 album Pure Heroine was a smash hit and radio-ruling single Royals and The Team Spawned. And what better way to build publicity for melodrama than Lorde giving her fans a preview of another song from the album? Maybe it could be a similar theme to Green Light, which is a breakup anthem. Artist Beats 1 told Zane Lowe that green light is about her first major heartbreak. And the song changes your life immediately after and is really about all the silly little things that you like those moments about gravitating towards. Either way, I'm looking forward to hearing Lorde sing her heart on Green Light Live from New York on Saturday night – and whether or not it And comes with the new song. Let's freak's do it! Responded to Wendy's Twitter account. The tweet earned more than 2 million likes since. It's a matter of time before the release date of Spicy Chicken Nuggets and the release date Chance The Rapper's new album. Perhaps it seems a silly question, but it is not. We live in a business society dominated by demands for ever greater performance. Yet while we are clear what the performance is, the focus on this will only produce confusion and frustration. Simple, some people say. Performance work is happening. Produce the results that you aimed at. Nothing else matters. There are no prizes for coming second. Of course, there are awards like this, but we'll give that pass. It is still worth thinking carefully about the prevailing idea that only delivering results counts as acceptable performance. If you don't reach the objectives, you may not have performed well enough. It is an enticing way of thinking. It seems tough and practical. After all, if you don't achieve what you want, what have you done? And in today's ultra-masculine business culture, sounding hard is important, even if the reality is rather different. Looking a little closer, though, this approach to performance is simplistic and is bound to cause trouble. No one can ensure favourable results from their efforts. There is also many chance to intervene between events to do what someone does and what happens as a result. As Scottish poet Robert Burns remarked two centuries ago: the best-kept plans o'rats a 'male gang aft eggle.' That often goes awry for the Scots. The future is full of unexpected events. The impossible prospect is near all the time. If you can do the best, something unexpected would frustrate your efforts. Are you responsible for this? Or for other people who mess up, or fail to fulfill their promises? Or the weather? The gyrations of the stock market? War and terrorist attacks? Obviously no. So treating performance as unsatisfactory on the basis of results alone is neither fair nor reasonable. Management by objectives may be a useful way to concentrate efforts towards an essential outcome, but evaluation by results is a poor strategy. Too many variables are left unaccounted for; Too many areas that have overlooked major impacts on the results. It's well Does not work The rest of life, too. If you set your heart on a particular result, and can't find satisfaction in anything else, you're taking a remarkable gamble. As you try, the results can still be negative. Responsibility versus control people confuse responsibility with constant control. You can accept the responsibility of running some part of a business, but that doesn't mean you can control exactly what happens in it. You can try to make things out of your way. You can work hard and use your best efforts. But you can't control the result, whatever you do. People who must work through others soon learn that they can't control people, but harden their leadership style. You can influence, persuade or attempt to inspire, but never control at all. Nor can you control external events. That is the reality. Again, you can work, plan, effort, hope and anxiety, but you can't control the result, whatever you do. To be responsible for something to take on an obligation to do its very best is to make that point happen. Nothing can be more than that. Pretending that failure is always down to responsible individuals—that they should control events as you wanted—is just macho nonsense. Incompetence may be punishable, but the inability to control the world is not. The results affect us, even if they are beyond our control, but they are no basis for recognizing performance or establishing the purpose of your life. Far better to focus on the tasks involved in seeking that result. They are under your control. You have to take credit or blame for what you do. So you might as well take the satisfaction available from doing something well, even if the end result wasn't what you wanted. Forget judging people from the results. That person doesn't base performance on something outside control. Judge by action and information. Everyone is fully responsible for their actions. A failure that came about from chance after very purposeful hard work clearly shows a chance for someone who made little effort to perform more than success. Finding satisfaction and purpose in action itself is far better than fixated on a result that lies mostly at the hands of chance. If doing well increases the odds on some success, that's a pleasant bonus. Still not convinced? Winning is rarely as important as we believe, but if winning is all that matters, as at war, remember Napoleon. When someone asked him what kind of people he saw to be general, he replied: Lucky people. Related posts: Adrian Savage is a writer, an Englishman and a retired business executive, in the same order.
