Overflowing With Golf Tradition

Wake Forest golf is filled with legendary names and unforgettable performances

By John Dell

Perhaps the best thing about the Wake Forest golf tradition, according to several players, is how much better the stories get as the years pass.

It's hard to argue that when it comes to golf, the Demon Deacons had one of the best traditions in all of college athletics which began ever so innocently late 1940s and early '50s when a hard-hitting Arnold Palmer wasn't famous yet. That tradition really got going when Jesse Haddock was named coach in 1961 and from there he nurtured the program into one of the most powerful and dominant to have ever competed in the ACC.

A tradition has to have great players, national championships and more importantly, a long stretch of dominance that is unmatched. The Deacons had it all during Haddock's tenure and it's something that his numerous former players say was something to behold.

There were three national championships (1974, '75 and '86) and countless All-Americans who went on to have, or are still having, outstanding careers in the pros. And there were several All-Americans and key players who didn't play golf professionally but were just as important to Haddock's motto of team play.

How did such a small school build such a deep tradition that some would say has carried even though some of the lean times? One reason it has probably been such a success was it never got lost in other sports, the way golf can sometimes get lost at much bigger school. And then there's the family atmosphere that surrounds the program.

"Everybody looks out for one another," said Jay Sigel, who wound up being the first recipient of the Arnold Palmer scholarship and was on one of Haddock's first great teams. "Everybody cares for the other guy and we all come back often and I'm amazed at how well the school does with academics, socially, athletically and everything else."

There are names such as Palmer, Sigel, Lanny Wadkins, Curtis Strange, Jay Haas, Scott Hoch, Billy Andrade, Len Mattiace, Joe Inman, and Leonard Thompson and most recently, Jay's son, Bill, who are probably the most well-known of the former Deacons. But the list of other great players could go on and on, such as Jack Lewis, Ken Folkes, Gary Hallberg, Chris Kite, Tim Straub, Eddie Pearce, Jim Simons, Billy Joe Patton, Jerry Haas, Ronny Thomas, Robert Wrenn, Bob Byman, David Thore and countless others.

An incredible 58 players since 1964 were named on one of the three All-America teams or honorable mention, including Hallberg, who was first team All-

America fourth straight years. Hallberg (1979), Strange (1974), Jay Haas (1975) also won the individual NCAA title. Bill Haas won a school record 10 tournaments and set numerous other records along the way and will likely become the next former Deacon to star on the PGA Tour.

"The tradition means a lot to me," Bill Haas said upon graduation earlier this summer. "There have been so many times people ask me where I go to school and when I say Wake Forest they say 'That's a great golf school.' And then when I say I play golf for them they automatically think you are a great golfer."

Two years ago the ACC came out with its 50 greatest athletes in each sport and several former Wake Forest greats were left out of that list, but that's a testament to how dominant the program had been. It would be hard enough to name the top 50 golfers of all-time at Wake Forest.

When you consider the Deacons first real great stretch of talented teams took place from 1962 to '72 when they finished in the top 10 in the NCAA Championship nine times, that's when the tradition started rolling.

"I was very fortunate and people believed in me," Haddock said recently. "But I never thought of myself as the main reason we won a lot. I was probably more self-conscious of other things in the way the golf program evolved and the way the players looked at me."

Haddock, who is 77 and lives in Winston-Salem in the winter and Grandfather Mountain during the summer, retired in 1992 with his legacy was cemented as one of the best college golf coaches of all time. Haddock acknowledges he didn't know much about the swing, but when it came to knowing what made his players tick, he was a physiological guru.

He helped guide the Deacons to 15 of the school's 18 ACC titles. The 18 titles are the most by any ACC school, despite not winning since 1989.

"When you look back at where the tradition started the first star and all of that it had to be Arnold," said Strange, who was part of what many consider the greatest college team of all time in 1975. "Yes, Arnold was our first star and our brightest star, but the way I look at it, that tradition doesn't start overnight. And it doesn't start with one player, but an entire program with many people. And I think that's where Coach Haddock comes into it because he did more than anybody."

Strange said that Haddock's genius was he got in a player's head and it usually worked.

"Everybody was different, but he had a way of bringing out your best," Strange said. "We kidded a lot with coach and with some of his methods, but he was good for me. I can only speak for myself but he was perfect for me. We all need a little discipline at that age and he knew how to get your going."

Just how deep were the Deacons back in the mid-70s? Haddock said that at one point his B team went to a tournament and wound up winning by 20 shots. That tournamement politely asked Haddock the next year he could bring just one team. There was probably not a better stretch of dominance overall in the program than the mid-70s where at one point Strange, Haas and Hoch were all teammates. But in fact Hoch, a Raleigh native who ranks in the top 20 on the PGA Tour in career money, was on the B team his freshman year when the Deacons won their second straight NCAA title.

"That's the reason I went there," Hoch said about the Wake Forest tradition. "I got a lot of really good offers from other schools that I would have liked to have gone to, but in the end it came down to what would help me to become a pro golfer. I had decided in my junior year of high school it's what I wanted to do for a living, was play golf. And I wanted to play with the best, and at that time, it was Wake Forest."

Hoch said he had a hard time beating out the upper classmen when he arrived at Wake Forest. But it made him work harder.

"(The tradition) started with a few good players and then we had some real great teams and people were attracted to the program," Hoch said.

Before Haddock got the head-coaching job, and even before Arnold Palmer and his boyhood friend, the late Buddy Worsham, arrived at Wake Forest, the Deacons had a pretty good program. The athletics director at the time, Jim Weaver, believed that golf was a way to enhance the university, according to Palmer.

So when Worsham decided to come to Wake Forest he brought his friend, Palmer, along. Worsham would later die in tragic car accident while they were both at Wake Forest.

"That's part of my of my life, being a Wake Forest guy and the fact that Jim Weaver, who was the athletic director and golf coach at the time, that I went to Wake Forest my first year and that had a tremendous impact on my life," Palmer said. "And it still has an impact on my life even today."

Palmer started the first scholarship for golfers at the school in the 1960s by starting the Buddy Worsham scholarship. Later, an Arnold Palmer scholarship was established and by the late 1980s every golf scholarship was endowed because of the way the former players have given back to the university.

The humble Palmer says he didn't start the tradition and, in fact, says there were plenty of others before him.

"There was certainly some golf tradition before I got there," Palmer said. "And it had to do with Jim Weaver because he had a keen interest in what happened there at Wake Forest when it came to golf. There were a couple people there before me such as Billy Joe Patton, Ray Harris and Freddie Hyatt who were there before me."

But Palmer acknowledges that he and Worsham did make a difference when they arrived.

"I have a lot of memories and certainly the one with the car accident is really a sad one," said Palmer, who was the first ACC champion in 1953. "Jim Weaver, Peahead Walker were key people in my life and certainly had a lot to do with me and what happened at Wake Forest. But particularly Jim Weaver and Johnny Johnson. And of course my fellow golfers whether it be Dick Tiddy or Freddie Hyatt. But there were just so many things that happened that had a tremendous influence on my life.

"We could probably do a book on what it meant to me."

It would also take a book to tell the story of how Haddock was suddenly given the

Alumni Spotlight: Bill Haas Carries On Golfing Family Tradition

By A.J. CARR, Raleigh News & Observer (June 1, 2004)

It was the second round of last summer's Porter Cup tournament, and Bill Haas was hankering to sink one more birdie putt.

But on the 18th hole, he got a bad break, took a bogey -- and settled for a 60.

"I said, 'If you can be disappointed with a 60, I am,'" Haas moaned.

Then he added, "But it was hard to be too mad."

The Wake Forest senior pursues lofty goals and reaches most of them by routinely firing low scores. The son of PGA Tour veteran Jay Haas has shot in the 60s a total of 23 times in 38 rounds and placed among the top 10 in 11 of 13 tournaments this season.

That earned Haas the Ben Hogan Award as the nation's top collegiate golfer and cast him in the favorite's role at the NCAA Championships starting today in Hot Springs, Va. His lament is that Wake did not qualify as a team.

The only area team to advance to the championship is North Carolina, which won a playoff against N.C. State to get the final East Regional berth on May 22.

Bill already has won 10 career college tournaments, the most ever for a Wake Forest golfer -- more than Arnold Palmer, Curtis Strange, Scott Hoch, Gary Hallberg or Lanny Wadkins.

"That makes me realize I lived up to the Wake standard," said Haas, who grew up in Greer, S.C., and always wanted to play for the Deacons. "Those guys became famous on the tour. That gives me motivation."

Haas plays golf like a guy who's late for a date, sometimes cruising 18 holes in less than 2 1/2 hours. Along with speed, his game sparkles with style and substance.

He can tame long par 5s with smoking drives that average 290 yards. His chipping and putting bear a champ's touch. And his savvy course management has enabled him to turn some potential 73s into 70s, or 70s into 67s.

But not always. On one rare day, he skied to a 79.

"He has matured with his game," said Wake coach Jerry Haas, who is Bill's uncle. "He was a little impatient at first, tried to make birdies on every hole. He's getting a little more patience, not so frazzled when things don't go well."

But things usually go pretty well because, as Jerry Haas pointed out: "He drives it straight, has tremendous length, plays smart, makes a lot of putts, chips and is a good bunker player. He has the complete package [and] can bring a course down to his level."

Bill Haas says his game has grown primarily because of what has happened between his ears.

"More than anything I've improved as a thinker, though I'm nowhere near where I need to be [compared] to players on the PGA Tour," he said. "Something else I'm working on is patience, knowing when to be aggressive and when not to be.

"I got good advice from my dad. He said you can par the first 13 or 14 holes and still shoot 69. Be patient. Pars are your friend."

Richard Sykes, who has coached N.C. State the past 33 years, says the 6-foot-2, 180-pound Haas is "as good as I've seen" emerge from the college ranks since Tiger Woods left Stanford in 1996.

"I don't know if he'll be another Tiger," Sykes said. "But unless I miss my guess, he'll be one of the best out there [on the PGA Tour] in a little while. He makes the game look too easy."

Haas, with a 68.02 stroke average this year, was raised in a golfing environment. In addition to his dad and uncle Jerry, the family also includes great uncle Bob Goalby, the 1968 Masters champion.

Although basketball was -- and still is -- a passion, Bill went to the links as a youngster and learned golf from his father.

"He's a much better player than I was at 22," Jay Haas said. "He has all the physical ability he needs [for the Tour]. It's a matter of time and experience. I'm looking forward to playing tournaments with him."

Jerry Haas believes the transition to the PGA circuit will be easier for Bill than it is for some players making the jump from college. After all, he has hung around with his dad and knows many of the tour stars, such as Woods, Phil Mickelson and Fred Couples, his boyhood hero.

"I feel like I have a doctorate in golf," Bill Haas said.

Laid back. Cool. Mellow. Humble. Those are words folks use to describe the Deacon's personality.

At Wake, Haas stood out as an athlete, yet blended into the student body. He went bowling (175 average) with friends, attended Deacons basketball and football games, majored in religion and achieved Dean's List status.

"He came to Wake with golf primarily on his mind," said Charles Kimball, professor and chairman of the Department of Religion. "He matured into a really fine student-athlete. In upper-level seminars, he was a very active participant in dialogue."

Haas also does some amiable chatting on the course.

N.C. State's Sykes recalls a time when one of his freshmen was awestruck to be playing in the same foursome with the Wake star. So Haas talked to the Wolfpack rookie throughout the round, trying to make him feel more comfortable.

"I consider it a treat to watch him," Sykes said of Haas. "[And] I'm going to enjoy watching him on television a lot more."

job as golf coach. He was an assistant athletics director for a long time and after Johnny Johnson was the head coach, Bones McKinney was the coach for awhile. Haddock was an assistant under McKinney, but when McKinney decided he didn't want to coach golf, it was Haddock's turn.

Before he was golf coach, Haddock worked in the athletics department as an assistant to Weaver. One fall he came back and they didn't have an equipment room for the football team at old Gore Gymnasium. So Haddock's idea was to knock a big hole in a load-bearing wall to make a window for the room.

But he didn't knock the hole in the wall himself. Instead he persuaded some football players to do it for him.

"We had a good football team back then with guys like Bill George," Haddock said. "So I got this sledge hammer and I hit the wall a few times and then told the players 'this stuff is good for you.' And then it turned into a macho thing and here are these guys banging this sledge hammer through the wall. And before they knew it, the hole was there and we had our equipment room."

So he already knew how the minds of athletes worked and it took that with him to the golf team.

John Buczek, who was on some of Haddock's best teams in the 1960s, said that Haddock had a way of not only recruiting the best players, but also a way of keeping them happy.

"Why did Wake Forest become a powerhouse in golf?" Buczek said. "I think that's directly related to the efforts of Jesse Haddock. I know Bones (McKinney) did some coaching early but I think Jesse was the one that kept the thing going and he obviously had success and it just snowballed from there."

Buczek said that while Haddock has been honored time after time he thinks there might be some who still overlook what Haddock accomplished.

"Jesse was there 40-something years and the type of person he is I think is somewhat overlooked," Buczek said. "They gave him a project there at Wake to be the golf coach and he wasn't really a golfer. But he knew athletics and No. 1 he knew people."

Thompson said he can laugh now about the way Haddock would get into his head right before matches. For most of the 1960s and early '70s teams played in matches, which is a lot different now where college teams play in big tournaments with 15 to 20 teams competing.

"He used to piss me off before every match and I didn't do anything wrong but somehow he'd get me so mad," Thompson recalled. "And then I'd go out and shot a 65 or whatever and Coach would do that to me every time. He just had a way of knowing each of his players and what made them tick."

Thompson said that there's no doubt that most if not all of his former players have a soft spot for Haddock.

"When he had that heart episode last year it scared us all," Thompson said. "If you ever have a second father, he is that guy and he was a second father to a lot of guys."

Haddock had one simple rule when it came to his teams. Even though golf is an individual sport, you play for the team first no matter what.

"I wasn't an Einstein or anything like that, but I was very perceptive when it came to feeling out players and how to handle things," Haddock said. "I was perceptive but a sleeping dog can be perceptive too. You can sometimes be laid back or know when to say something to a particular player. That's about the only way to describe how I did things."

Back when Haddock was building his empire there were only a handful of schools offering scholarships in golf. And back in the early days the NCAA didn't have a limit on the number of scholarships in non-revenue sports, so many thought Wake Forest had 10 or 12 scholarships for men's golf.

Haddock tells the story that he never told anybody how many scholarships he had at his disposal. Instead of coming clean, he kind of let the rumor grow.

"When we won the NCAA in 1975 and set the record by winning by 33 shots, the NCAA was having their meeting that same week on how they could cut expenses," Haddock said. "We had five and a half scholarships and the limit was eight at that time. And the teams' we were beating had eight scholarships but I never told anybody that."

And then there is the criticism from some quarters who said that Haddock's teams were so good was because he had the market cornered. But he still had to get those star junior players from around the country to come to Wake Forest.

His recruiting tactics included making sure a prospective player's parents knew their son would be looked after once he got to Wake Forest. It's a promise he made to all the parents, and he meant it.

"Some might say that I was lucky because I had the players," Haddock said. "But I had to get the players to come there."

Tim Saylor was another of Haddock's players who was part of both the 1974 and '75 championship teams. One of the things that Saylor is amazed at, even after nearly 30 years, is how Haddock was able to get the players to think about the team first.

"Coach Haddock had a sharp eye for recruiting somebody who was talented, but he also could see the desire in some guys and I think that helped separate us from a lot of schools," Saylor said.

Saylor believes that one of the reasons the Deacons were so good for so long was because Haddock was left alone for the most part to run the program. Of course, that changed in the late 1970s when Haddock left for nearly two years over a dispute about salary with Gene Hooks, the athletic director. But Haddock eventually returned and six years later the Deacons - led by Andrade, Mattiace, Kite, Straub and Barry Fabyan - won the national championship in one of the most remarkable final-round comebacks in NCAA history.

"Since there was such a tradition established when we were there we sort of benefited from all that went on before," Saylor said. "There were great players and guys who had great success in the pros. But it just seemed like when we were there the community support was so strong and it was just bigger than kind of what you remember."

In Haddock's talks with his teams he stressed the importance of not letting your teammates down.

"You didn't want to let anybody down and you really didn't have much time to think about yourself it was more about the team and Coach Haddock always made us believe that," Saylor said. "It was more about the school, the program, the community, the family or the team."

John Kelley, who played for the Deacons in the 1990s, was a part of Haddock's final team, and says looking back at his time on the golf team means a lot.

"I'm so lucky to have been a part of the tradition and now looking back and seeing some of the guys around here in Winston on occasion it's just neat how the whole thing evolved," Kelley said. "It's such a huge tradition and you can't compare it to anything else."

Strange says that while the players who went on to successful pro golf careers are important, he believes strongly that the tradition has a lot to do with the other players who have come and gone through the program.

"When you think about college golf is a team sport," Strange said. "In my case, Bill Argabrite, who is in Tennessee and is an attorney, was just as instrumental in our team as Jay or I. Tim Saylor is the same way. Those guys were just as important because it was a team sport. So I don't ever forget about those guys. Like David Thore, who lives in Reidsville, was my roommate and we couldn't have won championships without him."

Jay Haas said that other bigger schools have great golf programs, but Wake Forest is a special place and it shows each year when many of the pros return to the school's pro am at Old Town.

"There's no question you appreciate it the longer you are away from it," Haas said about his college years. "As we go on and look back and think of the times we spent there it was pretty darn special."

Jerry Haas, another of the long line of former All-Americans who played under Haddock and the younger brother of Jay, has been trying to resurrect that tradition since he took over the program in the fall of 1997. With the emergence of his nephew, Bill Haas, the last four years the program has been a contender for the national title.

But Jerry says he knows to get the program back up to what it was, there needs to be an ACC championship or even an NCAA championship. Since Haas took over the Deacons have placed in the top 10 in the NCAA twice including a fourth-place finish in 2003.

"There's no question that people still know about the tradition," Jerry said. "I don't have to usually say anything because when we recruit they have all heard of Arnold and Curtis and Jay, and I think having Bill here the last four years, that will help as well."

Because Jerry, who graduated in 1985, was part of that tradition he doesn't mind singing the praises of what it did for him.

"People know if you are faking it or whatever when you talk something up and I love what Wake Forest did for me and I love what the school means to me," Jerry said. "We are recruiting a kid right now whose dream is to play golf at Wake Forest and that's something that is very important. He wants to come here because of the tradition."

Jerry says he realizes the tradition suffered soon after Haddock retired, but he also pointed out the changing landscape in college golf. The Deacons have just four and half scholarships, and the much bigger state universities are less expensive to get into.

"I would have to say we are one of the best private universities when it comes to all of our sports programs," Jerry said. "It used to cost $2000 to go here back in the day and now it's like $37,000. So there is a difference when it comes to recruiting and other things."

That doesn't mean Haas doesn't try and recruit the best junior golfers.

"We go after the best players in the country and that will never change," Jerry said. "I know some people think that tradition is dead, but I'm not one of those. We will continue to build this program and to continue to keep that tradition alive."

1974 NCAA Champions

The Deacs were five strokes off the lead after each of the first two rounds, improved by one shot after the third and found themselves trailing the Florida Gators by four heading into the final day at the 1974 NCAA Championships, held at the Carlton Oaks Country Club in San Diego, Calif.

Coming on strong with a full-fledged team effort, the Deacs closed that to one stroke after nine; Wake Forest passed the Gators on the back nine and held a one-stroke lead as Curtis Strange and Florida's Gary Koch approached the 18th.

Strange's 18 not only determined the team title and clinched his one-stroke medalist win over Koch, but it will always be known as one of the finest moments in NCAA golf history. The golfers hit nearly identical drives. After Koch's second shot sailed to the back of the green, Strange's one-iron from 250 yards landed within seven feet of the pin. Strange sank his putt for the legendary eagle that secured the first NCAA golf team title for Wake Forest.

1986 NCAA Champions

The Deacons had "played themselves out of contention" for the NCAA title on their own Bermuda Run course. Or had they?

Trailing by 16 strokes and with four teams ahead of them heading into the final round, Coach Haddock's Deacs still waited until the back nine to pull off the miracle.

Down by 12 strokes, no one told them they weren't in contention, so the Demon Deacons played as if the championship was already theirs. Chris Kite led the charge and went five-under on the back nine to finish the day at 66, Billy Andrade and Len Mattiace scored 69, and Tim Straub contributed a 74. The team scored a 10-under total of 278 to beat Oklahoma State's Cowboys, featuring the phenomenal Scott Verplank, and win WFU's third NCAA title. Kite finished 13th individually, while Andrade and Mattiace placed 14th.

1975 NCAA Champions

In what is considered the most dominant performance in NCAA championship history, Wake Forest's 33-stroke team title may sound easy until you realize that the Deacs led after three rounds by a potentially tenuous, by-no-means secure six strokes over Oklahoma State. Incredibly, they improved by 27 strokes over the final round in one of the best team golf exhibitions ever at Ohio State's Scarlet Course in 1975.

Beginning with a 70 by Jay Haas, an incredible tournament-best 67 by Curtis Strange, a 73 by Bob Byman and a 74 by David Thore, the Deacons became uncatchable. Haas battled hole-by-hole throughout the afternoon with Alabama's Jerry Pate, but the Deacon held off the Tide's best with a birdie on 14 and a three-foot par putt on 18 to take the individual national title, the fourth in Wake Forest history. Byman finished fourth individually.

The Best College Golf Team... Ever?

1975 Wake Forest Golf – the "Best College Team Ever". That is what GolfWorld magazine proclaimed in its May 25, 2001 issue. The publication examined the history of collegiate golf and determined the 1975 dominating Demon Deacon squad ranked at the top. WFU won seven tournaments that season and captured the school's second straight NCAA title with a decisive 33-stroke victory over second-place Oklahoma State, the most lopsided win in NCAA history. Some of the sport's biggest names, such as Curtis Strange, Jay Haas and the legendary coach Jesse Haddock, were a part of that outstanding squad. It was a squad whose history-making feats nearly 30 years ago still place them as the best there ever was...

Wake Forest's NCAA Regional History

The NCAA began a regional playoff format in 1989 in which a set number of teams (usually the top 10) from three regions -- East, Central and West -- advance to the NCAA Championships. Wake Forest has earned a team regional berth in 15 of the 16 years this system has been in existence. In 10 of those 16 regional trips, the Demon Deacons have advanced to the Championships.

Deacon Details

Last spring, Wake Forest's Sean Moore became the first Deacon to win ACC Championship individual medalist honors since 1989.

Wake Forest has captured more ACC team championships (18) and individual titles (21) than any other league school. The Deacs also set a conference record with 10 consecutive titles from 1967-76.

Only four players in conference history have won two ACC individual titles, and two of those are from Wake Forest -- Ronny Thomas (1959, '60) and Scott Hoch (1977, '78). Georgia Tech's David Duval (1991, '93) and Clemson's Charles Warren (1997, '98) are the only other ACC golfers who can claim this distinction.

Wake's 44-stroke victory over runner-up NC State in the 1973 ACC Championship (1092-1136) set the league record for widest margin of victory.

All-Time Tournament Titles

Wake Forest has won 98 team tournament titles -- including 18 ACC crowns -- since 1955

An Elite Group: Five Wake Forest players -- Gary Hallberg, Robert Wrenn, Billy Andrade, Brent Wanner and Bill Haas -- were named All-ACC all four years of their career. In fact, only 10 golfers in the history of the league have accomplished this feat.

Deacon Details

Gary Hallberg was the first golfer in NCAA history to be named first-team All-American all four years of his career. To date, only three other golfers have accomplished this feat -- Arizona State's Phil Mickelson (1989-92) and Georgia Tech's David Duval (1990-93) and Bryce Molder (1998-01).

Jay and Bill Haas are believed to be the first father-son duo to be named first-team All-Americans. Jay was a first-team selection in 1975 and '76, while Bill earned the honor in 2002, 2003 and 2004.
