ACG and Wolters Kluwer Embark on New Publishing Partnership

Featured Science from the January Issue of The American Journal of Gastroenterology

BETHESDA, MD (January 22, 2019) – The American College of Gastroenterology is pleased to announce publication of the first issue of The American Journal of Gastroenterology under the College’s new partnership with Wolters Kluwer, who now publishes all three of ACG’s scientific journals: The American Journal of Gastroenterology (AJG), Clinical and Translational Gastroenterology (CTG), and the ACG Case Reports Journal (ACGCRJ).

ACG is confident that in Wolters Kluwer we have a meaningful partner who will help take all three journals to the next level. As a global leader in professional information services and a leading medical and scientific publisher, Wolters Kluwer brings deep experience to foster innovation and excellence in ACG’s scientific publications.

What to Look Out For in the January AJG?
The following is a selection of the impactful studies featured in this issue. ACG is happy to provide reporters access to additional articles upon request and to facilitate interviews with authors and Co-Editors-in-Chief Brian E. Lacy, MD, PhD, FACG, and Brennan M. R. Spiegel, MD, MSHS, FACG.
