Bail information on an inmate

There are five different types of bail, although some of them are used less frequently than others. Let's start with the most common. Cash bail Cash bail means the defendant pays the full amount of bail in cash. Sometimes the court accepts checks or even a credit card. The advertisement is also called bail, a secure bond can be used for any amount of bail, but it is especially useful when the accused cannot afford to pay bail. This type of bail often involves a friend or relative of the defendant contacting a bail agent, also known as bail. The bail agent is supported by a special type of insurance company called surety companies and undertakes to pay the full value of the bond if the defendant does not appear in court. In return, the bail agent charges his client a 10 percent premium and collects some kind of collateral (i.e. the title of house, car or boat, or jewelry or electronics). By involving a friend or relative, the bail agent hopes the defendant feels compelled to appear in court, since this friend or relative is likely paying a bail agent premium and has collateral on the line. It is also the bond of the bail agent, and if the defendant does not appear in court (known as skipping or skipping bail), then it will be the agent who is responsible for paying the entire bond. If the defendant skips the court date, the bail agent and even the defendant's family or friends could look for a bounty hunter, assuming it's legal in that state. Commercial bail is illegal in Illinois, Oregon, Wisconsin and Kentucky. Some states require bondsmen to be licensed. If you need bond bail, you can find ads in your local phone books. Citation Release (Cite Out) In some cases, the officer will not book the suspect at all, but will instead issue a citation saying the defendant must appear in court. While this process is less thorough than bringing a suspect to a police station and performing a formal booking process, it allows the arresting officer to focus on catching more serious offenders. Release on his own personal responsibility The judge may also decide to release the suspect on his own responsibility, meaning he is responsible for appearing in court and does not have to post bail. Personal recognizability is usually allowed only when the charge involves a relatively small, nonviolent offense and if the defendant is not considered a danger to anyone else or a flight risk - meaning that a person is highly unlikely to escape and will not appear on a court date. Asset bond Sometimes a defendant can provide some assets to act as a bond. In these cases, the court receives a bailed-in (basically legal claim) for the property. If the accused does not appear in court, the court may waive the property to restore lost bail. Dealing with Bail Bond agents Although bail agents may seem like part of the dirty work since they are constantly dealing with accused criminals, it is still a business like any other. Just as you would with a professional in another field, ask to see permission and bail identification. Most agents charge a 10 percent premium, but there may be some additional fees. Ask the agent to explain these costs and show them in the list of items. Similarly, get invoices for everything and request copies of anything you sign. (Of course, be sure to review all documents that you are asked to sign.) As with any type of loan, don't be thudded on funding you can't afford. If you are hiring a bail agent on behalf of a friend or relative, your agent should be available for questions and assistance. By all accounts, he will be, since he is interested to make sure his clients show up for their court dates. Technically, the defendant is in custody and it is his responsibility. Still, if it seems the agent won't be available to talk to you, move on to someone else. Many options are available that can be easily found in the phone manual, through a lawyer or online. While there are federal laws on bail procedures, state laws vary. Try the U.S. Bail Coalition website for more information on bail laws and bounty hunters in your state. The US and the Philippines are the only countries with a commercial bail industry (although other countries may use the bail system). How did it start in the U.S.? Judges, police officers and lawyers are not the only law-abiding professionals in the justice system to ensure that defendants follow convictions. The bond bail business is to guarantee money or property as bail for a criminal defendant. This job is not only exciting and different from day to day, but can also be lucrative. Read the steps below to find out how you can become bail. Do your research. Depending on where you live, you may not legally be allowed to work as bail. Contact your local bond agency or contact your local police station to find out if bail is allowed for criminal defendants in your area. Make sure you have the necessary requirements. If your region has bail options, find out the prerequisites for becoming bail. These may include age, educational and test requirements. Also, be sure to explore where you are eligible to become bail legally. You may be prohibited from obtaining proper licensing if you have been convicted of a crime or have held various duties [source: OK]. Contact your local licensing authority. Depending on where you live, the Public Safety Commissioner may be able to provide you with appropriate licensing to become bail. The Commissioner's Office may request data, financial financial or criminal records prior to issuing the license [Source: Hardy]. Contact the insurance agency. Depending on where you live, you may need to acquire bail insurance policies. Posting bail can sometimes be a risky profession, and insurance will guarantee that you have not run out of any assets [source: OK]. Bail bondsman or bail agent is one of those people you hope you never need, but if you do, where do you look? Internet, of course, right? It's a place where we look for a lot of different services these days, but blind searches aren't always the best way to tell which service or company is best. And that's certainly the case when it comes to finding a good bail agent. The reality is that there really is no established set of criteria for saying that one bail agent is better than another, said Eric Granof, CEO of ExpertBail in an interview with ConsumerAffairs. They all sell an insurance product that allows the defendant to be released before trial. If a family doesn't care what a bail agent is inappropriately dressed or isn't professional about how they treat consumers and manage their business, then it's really fair to say that a bail agent is a bad agent? A good insurer will take the time to talk to consumers about what they've done and haven't understood about the industry and the bail process. With this feedback, they can create a cornerstone for consumers to refer to, he said. But I don't plan on ever ingesting my bail agent, you might say. I never plan on doing anything bad to get arrested. More than half This might be true, but according to well-known statistics published in 1965, being arrested might be more possible than you think. And if it's not you, it could be a friend or a family member. Statistics show that 52% of Americans will be arrested at least once in their lives. While several crime experts have questioned the figures, other experts say the 52% is accurate or close to the actual percentage. A separate study published in the 2011 edition of Pediatrics found that one in three people would be arrested by the time they were 23. Findings by the Bureau of Justice Statistics show that the number of people in need of bail money rose by 30 percent between 1990 and 2006, which was the most recent year bail statistics were released. So the chances of him getting away with it or helping someone else get out of prison might not be as small as you think. How it works If you've been questioning how bail works, Granof says it's a pretty clear concept. The bond is set by the judge, he explains. Then you'd have a few options on how to get out of prison. You can pay the full amount of the bond to the court. Upon completion of your case and attending all your court appearances, your money will be refunded minus all court costs, costs, or other fees. If you don't have the full amount or don't want to give the full amount to the court, you can go to a commercial bail agent and get bail. Granof said. But depending on where you live in the United States, the bail system could work differently, so you'll need to check how it works in your state, says California advocacy group Shouse Law Group. The amount of bail varies depending on the offense, the company wrote on its website. For example, if you look at Los Angeles County's 2010 bail schedule, you'll see that your bail could range anywhere from $20,000 for the least serious offenses to $5,000,000 for the most outrageous offenses. Granof says the best way to understand how bail works is to think of the street as insurance. In the most basic sense, bail is a type of insurance product, he says. It operates in the same way as any other insurance policy you might buy. You'd pay a premium to an agent for a certain amount. So basically, the amount you pay will determine how much coverage you get. For example, if your bond was set at $10,000, you would pay a 10% premium -- or $1,000 -- to a bail agent, he noted. For this example, we will use 10% as a general premium amount, but it is important to note that nationally this number may vary from state to state and potentially county to county. In addition to paying the premium, the bail agent will also require the policy to be executed by a third party. This ahead can involve a signature along with the promise of some kind of collateral, Granof says. In other words, you may need to set up your house, car or other part of the property as collateral. Bounty hunters For those who might be confused about the difference between a bail agent and a bounty hunter, you're not alone. It's a common question. A bail agent and a rogue recovery agent (bounty hunter) are two different careers. A bail agent is a licensed insurance agent who is strictly regulated by the Insurance Division. If you've seen shows like HBO's Family Bonds, a show about a bail agency on Long Island, then you might have a different view of how the bail industry really works. Anyway, a bail agent's job is pretty inevitable, just like any security agent would tell you. In other words, it's nothing like what you see in Hollywood movies and on reality television, Granof says. Bail agents spend the day answering the phone, answering questions, educating and very often comforting and comforting family members as they deal with something they have more often than never had to deal with before. Some may think of bail agents as villains or those who put society at risk by letting a lot of people out of prison, but that's just not the case, Granof says. He says it's someone from prison completely on the The bail agent is not the person releasing the criminal from prison, he said. It was the judge who determined whether the defendant qualifies for bail and to which bail must be set so as not to be overly determined. The amount of bail in dollars is set at the level so that the defendant is unidated to appear in court or will pay a financial penalty. What to do Granof says consumers should ask these questions when looking for a bail agent: Does the agent act appropriately (professional, clean, etc.)? Does the agent have a physical office or are they just hanging out outside the prison looking for visitors? Do they have a current bail permit? You can usually check this online on the website of the State Insurance Ministry or on the appropriate regulatory agency website for that country. Do they come recommended by someone you know or trust? Do they have a rating at the Better Business Bureau or are they supported by a third party like ExpertBail? Do they have customer ratings on websites? Have you called an agent or have you been called (never trust a bail agent calling you out of the blue unless you can confirm that the person they represent has indeed asked to call you). you).
