Speed and the cloud Moving mission-critical applications to the cloud is a challenge, especially with regard to maintaining application speed and response time and available bandwidth. An internal application is usually monitored and managed by the enterprise's IT department that can work to improve performance. Such engagement is not available once an application is moved to the cloud. The company's IT department has little control over network conditions in the cloud provider's hosted data center. This lack of control is an important issue that is becoming more critical among cloud providers due to the nature of dynamic provisioning. There is no guarantee that another cloud customer on the same LAN will not push huge amounts of application traffic across the LAN at once. For example, when malicious customers have used the flexibility and unlimited computing power of the cloud to launch denial-of-service attacks. To address these challenges, focusing on application acceleration rather than network acceleration is important in cloud-based application deployments. In the data center, IT can configure SPEEDbit Cloud Accelerator for applications that are about to move to the cloud, and then provision another Speedbit Cloud Accelerator with the application user, whether it's a branch, another data center, an employee device, or another type of user that requires rapid cloud app performance. By Speedbit Cloud implement the applications in the cloud, along with the applications, a familiar set of performance standards and configurations, such as application availability slas, can be provisioned in the cloud and become a certain level of application the external network back to the company.
