Language families definition ap human geography

People have a special relationship with pets, and a full 62 percent say their pets understand the words they say source: USA Today. While there is no way to know exactly how much Fido gets what you say, scientists have proven that some dogs, monkeys and even dolphins can understand spoken language. In one study, a border collie named Rico revealed that he knew the name of more than 200 objects, and could receive these items on command of Source: Science. A similar study on another border collie named Chaser went even further. Chaser could not only distinguish between the names of at least 1,022 objects, but also draw conclusions about the names of new objects (source: Hecht). For example, if he was asked to bring Mr. Monkey - a toy he had never seen before - he could find Mr. Monkey during the liquidation process, when the monkey was placed next to toys he knew. Advertising Maybe even more exciting, Chaser was able to repeat this process of placing unfamiliar toys by name a full month later, after only being exposed to new items once. He was also able to understand verbs and objects used in different contexts; for example, Chaser demonstrated that he can put his nose to the ball, bring, touch or take the ball depending on the team. Just so you don't think border collies have an advantage, the Yorkshire Terrier demonstrated its understanding of more than 120 words in a separate study. Source: Hecht. But what about other animals that don't have such close relationships with humans? Consider the case of Kanzi, a bonobo monkey. Over the years, Kanzi has been able to demonstrate his understanding of more than 3,000 English words. Source: Raffaele. The researcher will speak words from a separate room to avoid providing any contextual clues, and Kanzi will listen through the headphones and point to the symbol represented by the word on his special keyboard. The monkey has also been able to respond adequately to commands such as: Put the soap in the water. Perhaps even more interesting is the case of a pair of bottlenose dolphins that demonstrated that they were able to understand the full sentences in a 1984 study. The trainers used computer sounds and hand signals to communicate with dolphins who were able to follow instructions ranging from two to five words in length. The Dolphins could also find objects placed in the tank with them within 30 seconds of being given, or report back to their coaches when the teams' data was impossible to execute source: Herman et al. As for the mighty domestic cat - studies show that cats can easily distinguish their owner's voice from other voices, calling their name source: and Shinozuka. While they send signals demonstrating that they know exactly what's going on, they're also clear that they don't care all that much and don't really care exactly what you're saying. It seems only suitable behavior for an independent cat. Finally, please note that the Certificate issued by Wellesley College is not an official college transcript and does not carry college credits. The proven achievement certificate issued by edX does not include the evaluation of letters and is not in itself a recognition of language proficiency. A verified Certificate of Achievement is automatically issued to all students who have received an average score of 60% for all self-correcting activities.
