GOBankingRates Methodology: GOBankingRates used the Census Bureau's 2018 Government Census to determine how much the United States in general and the 50 states collect on a variety of different taxes. To determine per capita tax collection, each total tax amount was divided by population, coming from the Census Bureau's 2018 American Community Survey. All data compiled on February 21, 2020. About the author When it's time to pay the taxi driver, we're all in the same boat. But what we pay isn't always the same. Because while most of your taxes in a given year are kicked into the IRS and the federal government, there's still a big part heading to the state house, and those taxes aren't consistent. Depending on the state you call home, the types of taxes you're subject to, and how much they amount to, are going to be very different. That's why GOBankingRates conducted a study to accurately expose what this tapestry of different state taxes looks like. The study used data from the U.S. Census Bureau to provide clear figures on how much money each tax collects annually. From there, the study divided the total by the state population to determine an approximate number of what each citizen's share goes to. After counting that figure in more than a dozen different forms of state taxes, not all of which are noted here, the study found the total amount of taxes collected per person per state and ranked the states from lowest to highest total taxes. You may be surprised to see all the things your state charges money for. Take a look at how much it comes out of your pocket—and pay check—and whether or not you should move to a more tax-friendly area.
