Credit bureau report in vietnam

There are several reasons why you should report to the credit bureau. If you are a landlord or you extend your loan as an entrepreneur, reporting to delinquent tenants and customers helps protect other lenders, plus strengthens your legal status if legal proceedings are needed. This also applies to businesses that extend credit even if you use a different credit reporting agency than you do for individuals. As an individual, you may find it necessary to report it to a credit bureau in case of fraud or identity theft. Report identity theft or fraud with free reports for Equifax (800-525-6285), Experian (888-397-3742) and TransUnion (800-680-7289). Please report all information about fraudulent transactions to all three companies. If you report only one, others will have no way of knowing that some of the information they have about you is false. Open an account with each of the three credit reporting agencies (see Resources) if you extend the loan to one of your customers/tenants within the business. It has a number of advantages. Your account allows you to check people's credit rating before extending the loan. While it costs a little more, it is best to have an account with each credit bureau because each of them keep their own records. You are also in a stronger legal position if your report is in the file with all three. Report any delinquents to credit bureaus. All three companies provide easy-to-use online forms. You will need a person's name, Social Security number, last known address and (if possible) place of employment. You'll also be prompted to enter details about the debt or transaction you're reporting (amount, date, due date, and services purchased or provided). Report businesses and check the credit ratings of companies using Dun & Bradstreet (see Resources). This is the main credit reporting agency for businesses and has the same function as consumer credit bureaus for individuals. You must have an account. After you open an account, you can report businesses that don't pay their bills and check your business credit ratings. Tips sellers that offer to make your credit reporting for you really are not a very good solution. Most charge almost as much (and sometimes more) as you pay for bills in all three credit reporting agencies—and you still have to enter all the same information online so you really don't get anything using a middleman. Staying on top of your credit report is the key to staying in good financial shape and not having your identity stolen. Fortunately, there are several different ways to get free credit reports pretty much whenever you want to see them. In this article, we will show you what your options are. You can get a free credit report from these sources it's Get a free credit report or report in minutes. Just know where to go and be ready to prove that you are who you say you are. Quick links: How to get a free credit report, why it's so important to check your credit report regularly It's important to regularly check your credit reports to make sure everything is accurate and that there are no errors. Credit bureaus often make mistakes, so you want to make sure they have everything in order. Checking your credit report is also the best way to check for any unauthorized activity. You may not even realize that someone has gotten their hands on your information until you find an unauthorized account or account in your name on your credit report. Identity theft and other mistakes can really throw your financial life into turmoil, so it's important that you keep up with your messages. Credit Reports vs. Credit Scores Your credit reports contain all the details of your credit accounts, both current and closed. Reports track payments and other information for each loan, credit card and any other credit line you have. Your credit score, on the other hand, is a number based on your credit history and activity. AnnualCreditReport.com if you're looking to get your credit reports from all three major credit reporting agencies (Equifax, Experian and TransUnion), your first stop should probably be AnnualCreditReport.com. It's important to check all three messages because they might not contain all the same information. By law, you are entitled to one free copy of your credit report from each of the offices per year and this site is the only place authorized by the federal government to give you access to all three at once. To get reports, you'll need to fill in some personal information, including your Social Security number, select the reports you want, and then request and review each report. If you have access to the printer, you can print the reports for a later view. Note that you may need to answer some additional security questions about past locations and old accounts that you had to access your reports, so be prepared for that. How to get free credit reports directly from credit bureaus If you would rather get your free reports directly from the credit bureaus themselves, this is possible in two out of three cases. TransUnion currently does not allow access to free credit reports online. Equifax Equifax To get a free credit report from Equifax, you must first sign up for their myEquifax program. As a member of myEquifax, you have access to your Equifax credit report twice a year for free. Beware, though, as Equifax may try to push you to sign up for one of their paid products. There's no need to do this to get a free report. Experian You can up get your free Experian credit report here. One nice thing about experian's offer is that it allows you to access your credit report for free every 30 days after signing up. This could be useful if you are in the process of trying to buy a house or car and want to be close to your messages. Again, beware of signing up for paid products with Experian. TransUnion Transunion Unfortunately, TransUnion currently does not allow access to your free credit reports online directly through them. Instead, they point you back to AnnualCreditReport.com and try to sell your credit monitoring product for $24.95 per month. Don't do it! Here's why money expert Clark Howard says you should never pay for monitoring loans. How to get a free credit report from Karma Credit Karma Another way to get a free credit report is through Credit Karma, a site that also lets you keep track of your credit score. Credit Karma allows you to access your reports from both TransUnion and Equifax and even highlight important information to make the reports easier to understand. You can update your reports once a week and check them as often as you want. Team Clark recommends Credit Karma as a free way to track your credit. Here are step-by-step instructions on how to register. As we have already said, the credit bureaus are not immune to errors. When you review your reports, you can find information that does not belong there. We have instructions on how to have incorrect information removed from your credit report here. The final idea of checking your credit report may not be at the top of the list of things to do in your spare time, but it's something Clark says you should do at least once a year. Making sure your message is correct and that there has been no unauthorized activity on your behalf is the surest way to keep your credit in tip-top shape. Using any of the above methods, the process is relatively painless. Best of all, it's free - and that's Clark Smart. So in the spirit of disaster prevention, why not check your credit reports as well? Checking your credit report should be a regular item in your financial to-do list, as it can show you how others perceive your creditworthiness and alert you to possible credit report errors or identity theft. We'll talk about why your credit report is important, when you should consider checking, and how you can get a free credit report through AnnualCreditReport.com. What is a credit report? Three different agencies collect information for your credit report: Experian, TransUnion and Equifax. They itemize all your past and present loans such as auto mortgage and student student like all open credit lines you have, such as credit cards (even if you don't have a balance with you). They also list information about accounts that went into collections, as well as public records filings such as bankruptcy or foreclosure. In addition, they list that asked about your loan for the last two years, such as a credit card company or other lender. Each agency then combines this information into a comprehensive report and calculates your credit score. This single number, which varies slightly from company to company, serves as an immediate summary of your creditworthiness. This allows potential lenders to see how you are having loans in the past and determine whether they should extend you the loan and at what interest rate. Reasons to check your credit report If you pay your bills religiously and are careful with your personal information, you may not think you need to check your credit reports. But you'd be wrong. Ideally, your credit report will hold exactly what you expect. But too often this is not the case. 1. Catch credit report errors It is important to make sure that no items are reported incorrectly and that all debts and accounts actually belong to you. For example, you might find that you're still an authorized user on your mom's credit card, which was set up ten years ago and never closed. While this might help your credit then, it might hurt it now. In addition, there may be inaccuracies in your message, such as if a closed credit card is reported as open or if your credit card limit is displayed as lower than it actually is. Credit report errors like these can have a negative impact on your credit score, but can be fixed for free. However, if you don't check your credit report regularly, you won't know if there are any errors. 2. Prevent identity theft and fraud In addition to possible errors, checking your credit report may alert you to potential fraud. You may not even know you've been a victim of identity theft until you pull out your credit report and find something that shouldn't be there. In fact, if you don't check your credit reports, you can learn about the scam when you start receiving collections of phone calls about debt that isn't even yours. Identity thieves take advantage of the fact that relatively few people pay attention to their credit. For example, a credit card may be opened in your name by someone else who rings a large balance but pays a monthly minimum so that they don't realize you're into fraud. In this situation, debt could literally exist for years without being smarter. Be aware that major identity theft is perpetrated by friends, family and acquaintances who have direct access to your personal documents. This type of theft usually lasts longer with extreme amounts of debt accumulated. Crushing sensitive and taking other preventive measures are certainly useful, but it is almost impossible to be 100% protected. If you pull all your credit reports on a regular basis, you have a good chance of catching bugs or fraudulent activity soon, at which point you can put a freeze on your credit so that additional damage is not done. When to get your credit report the most important time to pull out your credit report is a few months before you apply for any new, large debts such as a mortgage or car loan. This is so that if there are inaccuracies in your message or inconsistencies between different authorities' messages, you will be able to fix the problems as your lender sees it. Another good time to apply for a credit report is if you recently applied for a credit card, loan, job, or insurance, and were declined based on information within your credit report. Under the Fair Credit Reporting Act (FCRA), you are entitled to a free copy in these circumstances. However, you can only get a report from the agency that provided the lender who rejected your application. You have 60 days after receiving a rejection letter to request this message and the rejection letter usually provides specific instructions on how to request it from this agency. You are also entitled to a free report if you are unemployed and looking for a job, if you are on a social network, or if your report is inaccurate due to fraud or identity theft. This means that regardless of your situation, you should pull out your credit report at least once a year. How to Get Free Credit Reports The best place to get really free credit reports is online at AnnualCreditReport.com. This is a service provided by the federal government. Under the Fair and Accurate Credit Transactions Act, each person is entitled to receive a free credit report once a year from each of the three companies reporting loans. Other websites may ask you to sign up for a free trial for credit monitoring services in order to get your report. While these services may be valuable, understand that it is not necessary for you to sign up for one to view your credit report. When you AnnualCreditReport.com, you'll be prompted to select a country, enter basic personal information, and then select one of the three companies you want to pull the report through. You can receive one message every 12 months from each company. When you choose a company, it is sent to their website to complete your request. You'll need to provide information to help verify your identity, such as the name of the street you previously lived in or the company that had a specific account that you had in the past. These questions are intended to prevent others from illegally accessing your credit report. After you go through the process, you decide whether you want to (a) print a credit report online; do this by mail to you. If you request a copy by post, it can take up to three weeks to arrive. Be sure to keep your credit report in a safe place, such as a locked file box, or safe if you choose to keep a copy on paper. If you're saving a copy to your hard disk, make sure your computer is password protected and that you have a hard security package installed against hackers and viruses. The final word you do not want a nasty surprise when you apply for credit for the perfect car or home of your dreams. Nor do you want to find out that someone with the same name is enjoying and deteriorating your good credit for years. So make sure you know what's on your credit report and that everything out there is accurate. Even the smallest mistakes could turn into big problems along the way. When was the last time you checked your credit report? Have you ever found errors or fraudulent accounts? Accounts?
